

A SHORT COMMENTARY
ON THE
BOOK OF DANIEL.

London: C. J. CLAY AND SONS, CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE AVE MARIA LANE.

Cambridge: DEIGHTON, BELL AND CO.
Leipzig: F. A. BROCKHAUS.
New York: MACMILLAN AND CO.

A SHORT COMMENTARY

ON THE

BOOK OF DANIEL

FOR THE USE OF STUDENTS

for Lent
C 1310

BY

A. A. BEVAN, M.A.

FELLOW OF TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

CAMBRIDGE:

AT THE UNIVERSITY PRESS

1892

Καί μοι δοκεῖ μεγίστην θεὸν τοὺς ἀνθρώπους η φύσις ἀποδεῖξαι τὴν Ἀλήθειαν καὶ μεγίστην αὐτῇ προσθεῖναι δύναμιν. πάντων γοῦν αὐτὴν καταγωνιζομένων ἐνίστε καὶ πασῶν τῶν πιθανοτήτων μετὰ τοῦ ψεύδους ταπτομένων, οὐκ οἶδ̄ ὅπως αὐτὴ δὶ' αὐτῆς εἰς τὰς ψυχὰς εἰσδύεται τῶν ἀνθρώπων, καὶ ποτὲ μὲν παραχρῆμα δείκνυσι τὴν αὐτῆς δύναμιν, ποτὲ δὲ καὶ πολὺν χρόνον ἐπισκοπούσθεῖσα τέλος αὐτῇ δὶ' ἑαυτῆς ἐπικρατεῖ καὶ καταγωνίζεται τὸ ψεῦδος.

POLYBIUS, Fragm. of Bk. XIII.

Salar Jung Library
WESTERN SECTION.

Cambridge:

PRINTED BY C. J. CLAY, M.A. AND SONS,
AT THE UNIVERSITY PRESS,

PREFACE.

THE main object of this work is to assist those who are entering upon the study of the language and text of the Book of Daniel, by affording them such philological information as they are most likely to need. Since however philology can never be separated from history, I have found it necessary to devote considerable space to the treatment of historical questions. In the history of religion the Book of Daniel occupies a very important, perhaps a unique, position, but the working out of this subject belongs rather to the historian than to the commentator. Hence the relation in which this Book stands to the Prophets on the one hand and to the later Apocalypses on the other could not here be examined at any great length. Discussions upon speculative theology or philosophy I have studiously avoided, as I cannot but think that when introduced into exegetical works they serve rather to obscure than to elucidate the real matters at issue.

It is scarcely necessary to say that this work contains very little that is new. As to the character and general meaning of the Book of Daniel all sober critics have long been agreed, and I have therefore, in the great majority of cases, contented myself with stating, as concisely as possible, the views of former investigators. It has been my endeavour to collect, not only from Commentaries but from all other sources accessible to me, whatever appeared to be of real value for the purpose of interpretation. In a book intended for ordinary students an exhaustive treatment of the subject is, of course, out of the question. Hence it did not seem to me desirable to fill my pages with bibliographical details interesting only to the curious. It would indeed have been easy to supply much fuller lists of names and references, but had I attempted to give anything like a history of the interpretation of each passage, my book would have been swelled to many times its present bulk. Only now and then have I thought it worth while to say something about the views of the Rabbins and of the Christian Fathers. In citing modern writers I have generally confined myself to mentioning those whose works are the fruit of original research, passing over in silence the crowd of imitators and imitators of imitators. I ought here to state that I have unfortunately not been able to consult the essay of J. W. van Lenep, De 70 jaarweken van Daniel (Utrecht, 1888). Still more have I reason to regret that Prof. Driver's Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament did not appear till my book was in the press, and has thus been used only to a very limited extent. Some persons may perhaps think that I have not examined at sufficient length the arguments brought forward by Hengstenberg and English writers who belong to the same school. But the fact is that in a great number of cases these arguments are based upon assumptions which all scholars now agree in rejecting. Of what use would it be, for example, to refute such arguments of Hengsteuberg as rest upon the theory that the First Book of the Maccabees was originally written in Greek, or to point out the numerous statements of Pusey, respecting Aramaic philology, which are now universally regarded as erroneous ?

On many questions, as might have been expected, I have found it impossible to form a definite opinion. Though the Book of Daniel is by no means one of the more difficult books of the Old Testament, it nevertheless contains a considerable number of passages of which the meaning is still uncertain, and some which will perhaps remain for ever unintelligible. Where doubt or obscurity exists I have never sought to disguise the fact, and in offering explanations of my own I have been careful to indicate that they are mere suggestions to be accepted or rejected by the reader as he thinks fit. One principal cause of difficulty seems to me to be the corruption of the text. During the last fifty years the opinion that the text of the Old Testament is well-nigh faultless, has been constantly losing ground. The common maxim that the difficulty of readings raises a presumption in favour of their genuineness, is true only if understood to mean that no scribe consciously substitutes a difficult reading for an easy one. But when readings owe their origin to carelessness or to the external damaging of a manuscript, the above maxim is obviously inapplicable. In very many cases the text of the Old Testament can be explained only by means of conjecture, and our task consists in deciding which of several conjectures is the most probable. When I have proposed conjectural emendations I have done so in the full consciousness of the fact that very few emendations have any claim to be regarded as certain. The Hebrew of Daniel, as compared with that of other Old Testament writings, has so many marked peculiarities that it would be altogether a mistake to ascribe every anomaly to textual corruption. The business of the true textual critic is to distinguish those anomalies which are characteristic of the author's style from those which are not, in other words to distinguish linguistic peculiarities from linguistic impossibilities. The practice of rash and arbitrary emendation cannot of course be condemned too severely, but the old-fashioned school, who tortured grammar and syntax in order to extract a meaning from obscure passages, must appear equally unscientific.

In all that relates to Aramaic philology I have been guided chiefly by the works of Professor Nöldeke, of Strassburg, in particular by his Mandäische Grammatik (Halle, 1875), and his "Beiträge zur Kenntniss der aramäischen Dialekte" in the Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft, Vols.

xxi. xxii. and xxiv. By far the best work on Biblical Aramaic is Prof. Kautzsch's Grammatik des Biblisch-Aramäischen (Leipzig, 1884). If I have occasionally ventured to express disagreement with Prof. Kautzsch, this has been done solely from the conviction that his work is likely long to remain a standard book of reference, so that it is particularly necessary to point out those statements in it which are open to criticism. The older Grammars are very untrustworthy, since they were written at a time when a scientific classification of the Aramaic dialects had not yet been made, and when Biblical Aramaic (or, as it used to be called, Chaldee) was commonly believed to be a dialect learnt by the Jews in Babylonia during the Exile. That it is, on the contrary, a West-Aramaic dialect, has now been conclusively proved. I have endeavoured throughout to call attention to the close resemblance between the Aramaic of the Bible and the dialects afterwards spoken in Palestine and the neighbouring countries. In order the better to illustrate that resemblance I have published, in an Appendix, some specimens of the Palmyrene inscriptions, which have hitherto been practically inaccessible to most English students. Very similar is the dialect represented by the Nabatean inscriptions, which may best be studied in Prof. Euting's Nabatäische Inschriften aus Arabien (Berlin, 1885). The dialect of the Palestinian Christians is known chiefly from the Lectionary published at Verona in 1861—1864 by the Count Francesco Miniscalchi Erizzo, under the title of Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum. In referring to the Samaritan dialect I have always quoted from Nutt's Fragments of a Samaritan Targum (London, 1874), of which the text is generally admitted to be more correct than that contained in the Polyglot Bibles.

Of Assyriology I possess no independent knowledge. My principal authority is Prof. Schrader's work The Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Old Testament, which I have used in the English translation (published by Williams and Norgate, 1885—1888), since it contains the latest corrections by the author.

In my citations I have followed the paging of the German edition, which is given in the margin of the English text, so that possessors of either work will be able without difficulty to verify my references.

The transcription of Oriental words is notoriously a matter about which scholars still differ, and here I have found it impossible to be strictly consistent. Quotations from Phoenician and Aramaic inscriptions, from the Samaritan Targum and from the Christian Palestinian Lectionary have been printed in ordinary Hebrew letters. Syriac has usually been printed in the Old Syriac character, without vowel points, but when it was necessary to indicate the vocalization, I have, for the convenience of those who do not read Syriac, followed the method of transcription adopted by the late Prof. Wright in his article "Syriac Literature" (Encyclopaedia Britannica, 9th ed.)—a method which in spite of some disadvantages is perhaps the best that has yet been proposed. Assyrian and Babylonian words are generally spelt as in Prof. Schrader's work, but for š, which is liable to perplex English readers, I have written sh, and the guttural which corresponds to the Arabic ȝ has been represented by kh. It is perhaps not superfluous to add that the real pronunciation of the Assyrio-Babylonian language is still very uncertain, since even on points so important as the number of the vowels Assyriologists are not yet agreed, some maintaining and others denying that e and i are distinguished in the cuneiform character.

In a work compiled from so many scattered sources and touching upon so many different subjects, errors will naturally be found. Some of these have, I hope, been rectified in the "Addenda et Corrigenda", but others no doubt remain. If in any place I have failed, through inadvertence, to acknowledge obligations to previous writers, I beg to offer them my sincere apologies. It remains for me to express my thanks to those personal friends who have aided me in the revising of this book. Prof. Robertson Smith has been so good as to read through the greater part of it, either in manuscript or in proof, and to him I owe many valuable suggestions. I am also greatly indebted to Mr E. A. Wallis Budge, of the British Museum, who has on several occasions supplied me with information on Assyriological matters.

TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE,
Dec. 1891.

ADDENDA ET CORRIGENDA.

Page 3—That the original Pēshīṭtā did not contain the apocryphal additions to Daniel may be inferred from the fact that Polychronius, who lived early in the 5th century, says with reference to the Song of the Three Children, Εἰδέναι δὲ δεῖ ὡς οὐτος ὁ ὄμυνος οὐ κεῖται ἐν τοῖς Ἐβραϊκοῖς ἢ ἐν τοῖς Συριακοῖς βιβλίοις.

- p. 9—Since the above was written, a posthumous edition of Prof. Delitzsch's Messianic Prophecies has appeared.
- p. 17, line 30—For Nabūnāāl read Nabūnāāid; the same mistake occurs again on p. 18 and in the note on p. 19.
- p. 36—The suffix הם “their” appears frequently in Nabatean inscriptions, most of which are post-Christian.
- p. 37—As specimens of the Passive formed by internal vowel-change may be mentioned the word עבידת “was made” in a Nabatean inscription of the year 39 A.D. found at Madabah (see the Zeitschrift für Assyriologie, Vol. v. p. 290), and the Palmyrene נבי “has been taxed” (cf. נלי Dan. ii. 19, 30) in the Fiscal Inscription, where it is said טעהן קרט די כלמא נэм כליה לארביעא טעונין די גמלין “ממכנא נבי,” “a cart-load of whatsoever kind has been taxed as much as four camel-loads.”
- p. 39, line 19—For ‘älayk read ‘älaīk.

- p. 41, note 2—It should be noticed that in this passage of Polybius the κεράτιον corresponds to the קָרְנוֹת of Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15. The reading κεραμίον is evidently a mistake.
- p. 70—With regard to the phrase בַּקְבָּל דִי “because”, I should have cited the remarks of Luzzatto in his Elementi grammaticali del Caldeo biblico, p. 52, “La voce בַּל non ha qui alcun valore, e sembra che le due voci בַּקְבָּל formassero primitivamente una sola voce בַּקְבָּל egnale al Rabbinico בְּקָבָבִי, בְּקָבָבִי. Da בַּקְבָּל sembra nato il corrispondente בְּקָעֵמָה di Koheleth”. This explanation appears to me decidedly preferable to the ordinary one.
- p. 74—On אָלֶא “behold!” see Prof. Driver’s note (Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament, Addenda, p. xxv), where the word הָלֵא in an Aramaic inscription of Egypt (Corpus Inscr. Sem. Pt. 2, №. 137) is explained as being probably a variant of אָלֶא.
- p. 83, last line—For Lehnwörter read Fremdwörter.
- p. 86, line 16—For (and תְּפִלָּה chap. v. 16) read (and תְּפִילָה chap. v. 16, Kēri).
- p. 120, line 17—For Chald. Wörterb. read Wörterb. über die Targumim.
- p. 146—The method of interpreting Scripture by the artificial combination of different passages is so strikingly set forth in a fragment of Origen’s Commentary on the Psalms that it may be worth while to quote it. “In entering upon the interpretation of the Psalms, let me first cite a tradition of singular beauty which has been handed down to me by my Hebrew teacher as applying generally to all Holy Scripture. This Hebrew used to say that all divinely-inspired Scripture, by reason of its uncertain import, might be compared to a number of chambers in a single building, all locked. At the door of each chamber there is a key, but not the key which fits it; and thus the keys have been scattered over the chambers, none being adapted to the chamber where it is found. Hence it is a work of enormous difficulty to find the keys and to fit them to the chambers which they are capable of opening. The Scriptures then can be explained only when they receive one from another the first hints towards their explanation, since they contain in themselves

- scattered up and down the principles of their exegesis". (See Delarue's edition, Vol. II. pp. 526, 527.) For this reference I am indebted to the kindness of the Rev. J. A. Robinson of Christ's College.
  - p. 148, line 5—The date 588 B.C., for the destruction of Jerusalem, is that given by Schürer (Gesch. d. jüd. Volkes, II. p. 616) and by Driver (in the Chronological Table at the beginning of his Isaiah, his life and times). But the latter scholar has since adopted the view that Jerusalem was destroyed in 586 B.C. (Introduction, pp. 232, 233).
  - p. 183, line 21—It is possible that וְבַת הַנָּשִׁים is a corruption of וְבָתוֹ בְּנָשָׁם, i.e. "and he shall give him his daughter to wife" etc. The phrase "to wife", "in marriage", does not seem to occur elsewhere in Hebrew or Jewish Aramaic, but تنع often has this meaning in Syriac; cf. The Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite, ed. Wright, p. 19 of the Syriac text, line 8—تنع לְ תִּמְבְּרָה "she gave her to him in marriage".

CONTENTS.

PROLEGOMENA.

	PAGE
General Introduction
The text and the oldest Versions	1
Ancient and medieval interpreters	4
Modern interpreters	5
Origin and Purpose of the Book of Daniel	11
Linguistic character of Daniel	26
The Hebrew of Daniel	28
The Aramaic of Daniel	33
Foreign Words in Daniel	40
The Septuagint Version	43

COMMENTARY.

Chapter I.	57
Chapter II.	64
Chapter III. (verses 1—30)	78
Chapter IV. (iii. 31—iv. 34)	86
Chapter V. (v. 1—vi. 1)	98
Chapter VI. (verses 2—29)	107
Chapter VII.	113
Chapter VIII.	127
Chapter IX.	141
Chapters X—XII.	162
Appendix I.—The Palmyrene Dialect	211
Appendix II.—Chronological Tables	225
Index of Words and Roots	229

N.B. Citations from the Old Testament are always made according to the chapters and verses of the Hebrew Bible.

PROLEGOMENA.

GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

The Text and the oldest Versions.

THE Palestinian Jews, as is well known, divided their Scriptures into three parts, the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa (Heb. הָגִיאֹת). The Book of Daniel was never, so far as we know, included among the Prophetical Books, but occupied a place in the Hagiographa. In our present Hebrew Bibles, Daniel stands between Esther and Ezra; in ancient times, however, the order of the books in the Hagiographa was not rigidly fixed.

The received Jewish or Masoretic text of Daniel is written partly in Hebrew (chaps. i.—ii. 4 a, viii.—xii.), partly in the Aramaic dialect spoken by the Jews of Palestine (chaps. ii. 4 b—vii.). At what time this text assumed its final shape, cannot be positively stated, but it is now agreed that the present Jewish Bible, leaving out of account the vowel-points, accents etc., is virtually identical with that which was used in the latter half of the second century after Christ. Many scholars believe the Masoretic text to have been fixed much earlier, though few would venture to go further back than about the beginning of the first century—the date assigned by Nöldeke (Die alttestamentliche Litteratur, p. 241). It is in itself probable that the text of some books was fixed earlier than that of others. Since the Book of Daniel, like most of the writings included in the Hagiographa, does not appear to have been used in the public services of the Synagogue, it was presumably one of the latest books to assume a stereotyped form.

Daniel and Ezra-Nehemiah are the only books of the Old Testament which are lacking in the collection of Aramaic versions or paraphrases known as the Targums. Whether this be due to the fact that parts of the books in question are already written in Aramaic, is uncertain. In the Mishnah (Yādayim IV. 5) the Aramaic portions of Ezra and Daniel are called Targum, but they are expressly distinguished from other Targums, since they always "defile the hands" (i.e. they are of Canonical dignity).

The so-called Septuagint version of Daniel is generally believed to have been made rather more than a century before the Christian era. An examination of this version reveals at once two facts, firstly that the text used by the translator, or translators, differed in numerous details from the Masoretic text, secondly that the version contains an unusual quantity of later additions and alterations. To this work a separate chapter will be devoted.

The Greek versions of Aquila and Symmachus have been preserved only in fragments, as in the case of other Old Testament writings. On the other hand, Theodotion's version has been handed down to us entire. According to some Theodotion was a Jew, according to others an Ebionite Christian. It was formerly supposed that he lived about the middle or end of the second century after Christ, but Schürer has lately brought forward arguments to prove that his date may be somewhat earlier (Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes, II. p. 709). Theodotion's version of Daniel is to be regarded as a revision of the Septuagint for the purpose of making it agree more closely with the Masoretic text, or at least with a text differing from the Masoretic only in a very small number of minute details. The apocryphal additions (Susanna, the Song of the Three Children, Bel and the Dragon) were retained by Theodotion, though with some changes.

Whether Theodotion's translations were ever used among Greek-speaking Jews, is not known; but in the Christian Church his translation of Daniel rapidly became so popular as almost entirely to displace the old Septuagint version. Yet, as might have been expected, reminiscences of the Septuagint soon found their way into Theodotion's text, while the Septuagint in its turn became interpolated from Theodotion. One striking proof of the popularity of Theodotion's Daniel and of the obscurity into which the Septuagint text fell, is that Porphyry, writing about 270 A.D., based his criticism of the Book of Daniel upon Theodotion's version, which he believed to be the original<sup>1</sup>. In the time of Jerome this version alone was in official use among Greek-speaking Christians, and so long had the Septuagint been set aside that the reason of the change had been forgotten (Praef. in Vers. Dan.).

The Coptic version published, with a Latin translation, by Tattam in his Prophetæ Majores (Oxford, 1852), is evidently based upon Theodotion<sup>2</sup>, though it contains occasional interpolations from the Septuagint. It may be remarked in passing that the Coptic text has a long additional chapter which was composed centuries after the Mohammedan conquests, probably in the reign of the Fatimite Caliph Al-Hākim (996—1020 A.D.). It is a naïf attempt to bring the prophecies of Daniel down to date. The author, like most other apocalyptic writers, displays great ignorance of the remote past, while as he approaches his own time his descriptions gradually become more minute and more accurate.

The Old Syriac Version, the so-called Pēshittā, almost invariably follows the present Jewish text—the apparent divergences being generally due to the paraphrastic style of the translator or to later corruption. Only in a very small number of cases does it appear at all probable that the text used by the translator differed from the Masoretic. The apocryphal pieces are found even in the oldest MSS. of the Pēshittā, but seem not to have belonged to it in its original form.

<sup>1</sup> That Porphyry believed the Greek text to be the original is expressly affirmed by Jerome (Prol. Comm. in Dan.), and that the Greek text used by Porphyry was Theodotion's appears from Jerome's commentary on Dan. xi. 38, “Deum MAOZIM ridicule Porphyrius interpretatus est, ut diceret in vico Modin, unde fuit Mathathias et filii ejus, Antiochi duces Jovis posuisse

statuam, et compulisse Judaeos ut ei victimas immolarent, id est, deo Modin.”

<sup>2</sup> The same would seem to be the case with the Coptic text edited by Joseph Bardelli (Pisa, 1849), as far as can be gathered from the Latin preface, for my ignorance of the Coptic language makes it impossible for me to speak from personal investigation.

Ancient and medieval interpreters.

The ancient Jewish interpretation of the Book of Daniel is known but imperfectly, since it was not till the Middle Ages that the Jews began to compile systematic commentaries, and we have therefore to gather our information from stray allusions in the Talmud, the Midrashim, and other works. The statements of Josephus on this subject are of little value, as his acquaintance with the book was very superficial<sup>1</sup>. Much Jewish tradition as to the book of Daniel may be found embedded in the works of the Christian Fathers. Among the writers who are of most value in this respect may be mentioned the Persian Christian Aphraates (who lived in the middle of the 4th century, and whose Homilies have been edited, in the original Syriac, by Prof. Wright), Aphrēm of Nisibis (commonly known as Ephraim Syrus), of whose Commentary on Daniel excerpts have been published in the Roman edition of his works, and, above all, Jerome.

One writer, who was neither a Jew nor a Christian, the Neo-Platonic philosopher Porphyry (233—304 A.D.), a native of Tyre, occupies a prominent place in the history of the interpretation of Daniel. He wrote a Treatise against the Christians, in 15 books, of which the 12th was intended to prove that the Book of Daniel had been composed by a Palestinian Jew in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, that the supposed prophecies of Daniel relate the history correctly as far as the time of the real author, and that beyond that point they are mere guesses<sup>2</sup>. For the purpose of his work Porphyry had studied various Greek historians, among whom were several quodam qui temporibus Antiochi, qui appellatus est Epiphanes, fuerit in Iudea, et non tam Danielem ventura dixisse quam illum narrasse praeterita. Denique quidquid usque ad Antiochum dixerit veram historiam continere, si quid autem ultra opinatus sit, quia futura nescierit, esse mentitum.” Jerome, Prol. Comm. in Dan.

<sup>1</sup> See Antiq. x. 11. 7, where the vision in Dan. viii. is confused with other parts of the book in a manner which shews that Josephus was writing from vague recollection.

<sup>2</sup> “Contra Prophetam Danielem duodecimum librum scripsit Porphyrius, nolens eum ab ipso cuius inscriptus est nomine esse compositum, sed a

now lost<sup>1</sup>. His treatise has, of course, perished, but considerable fragments are cited by Jerome and other writers.

The theory of Porphyry, as may well be imagined, met with no favour. It was “refuted,” before the time of Jerome, by Methodius, Eusebius of Caesarea, and Apollinarius, and appeared to have been swept away for ever. But it was to be heard of again.

In the 9th century the Jews, influenced by the Mohammedian schools of learning, began to give the exegesis of the Old Testament a scientific form. Of the medieval Jewish commentaries on Daniel one of the earliest was the work of Saadia (892—942 A.D.), the Gāōn, or head of the academy, of Sūrā in Babylonia. This work is quoted by Ben-Ezra, and a fragmentary copy of it exists in the Bodleian (see Neubauer's Catalogue, No. 2486); the commentary which appears in the Rabbinic Bibles under the name of Saadia is the work of a much later author<sup>2</sup>. Shēlōmōh ben Yishāk (commonly known as Rashi, 1040—1105), and Abraham ben Mēr ben Ezra (commonly known as Ben-Ezra or Abenezra, 1090—1168), are the most important of the medieval commentators. Ben-Ezra is incomparably superior to Rashi in acuteness and originality, but for that very reason less valuable as a depositary of Jewish tradition. The Commentary of Yepheth ibn 'Alī, a Karaite Jew, who wrote about 1000 A.D., has lately been edited in the original Arabic, with an English translation, by Professor Margoliouth.

Modern interpreters.

Modern Christian commentators on Daniel were, until the latter part of the 18th century, almost entirely dependent on Jewish and Patristic tradition. Occasionally doubts were expressed, for example by Spinoza and Hobbes, as to whether <sup>1</sup> “Ad intelligendas autem extremas partes Danielis multiplex Graecorum historia necessaria est: Sutorii videlicet Callinici, Diodori, Hieronymi, Polybii, Posidonii, Claudii, Theonis, et Andronici cognomento Alippi, quos et Porphyrius esse secutum se dicit.”

Ibid.

<sup>2</sup> The statement on this subject in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, Art. “Daniel,” is incorrect.

Daniel had actually put in writing the whole of the book ascribed to him, but as a rule the authenticity and integrity of the work were confidently assumed. Sir Isaac Newton gave it as his opinion that "the last six chapters contain prophecies written at several times by Daniel himself; the first six are a collection of historical papers written by others" (Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse of St John, p. 10). This theory, however, was not intended to call in question the absolute veracity of the book, and Newton expressly declared that to reject Daniel's prophecies "is to reject the Christian religion. For this religion is founded upon his Prophecy concerning the Messiah" (p. 25).

Some approach to a critical examination of Daniel was made by J. D. Michaelis, who had doubts as to the antiquity of certain chapters (see his Deutsche Uebersetzung des Alten Testaments, Vol. x., Anmerkungen zum Propheten Daniel, p. 22). The first modern writers who ventured to dispute the authenticity of the whole, were Corrodi and Eichhorn. But the commentary of Bertholdt, Daniel neu übersetzt und erklärt, 1806—1808, was the first serious attempt to grapple with this historical problem. Bertholdt, however, adopted the unfortunate hypothesis that Daniel is the work of nine distinct authors. Gesenius clearly recognized that the whole book was written under Antiochus Epiphanes, and protested against Bertholdt's theory of a composite authorship (see the Allgemeine Literaturzeitung, 1816, No. 57, and also the Ergänzungsblätter of the same, No. 80). Gesenius was followed by Bleek and De Wette, who in the most important points agreed with him.

During the last sixty or seventy years almost all writers unbiased by dogmatic prejudices have maintained both the literary unity of Daniel and the theory of its Maccabean origin. Even as to the interpretation of details there has been little disagreement. Of the commentaries the most valuable are those of Von Lengerke (1835), Hitzig (1850), and Ewald (in the 3rd Vol. of his Propheten des Alten Bundes, 2nd ed. 1867 and 1868).

It was not to be expected that the critical theory of the Book of Daniel would be accepted without a contest, for all the partisans of ecclesiastical tradition, both Catholics and Protestants, had an obvious interest in withholding it. The history of the controversy is particularly instructive. At first the so-called “defenders of Daniel” endeavoured to maintain the traditional opinion in all its integrity. Of concession or compromise they would hear nothing. They argued that if the Christian religion be true, the book of Daniel must be authentic, and consequently that all arguments urged against its authenticity must be worthless. They spent enormous labour in seeking to shew that the impugned statements in Daniel were not only not disproved but were signally confirmed by the testimony of history, and they confidently predicted that further research would justify their position. Of these apologists the most eminent were Hengstenberg (Die Authentie des Daniel und die Integrität des Sacharjah, 1831) and Hävernick (Commentar über das Buch Daniel, 1832). The apologetic works of Auberlen, Kliefoth, Keil, Pusey, and others, are, in the main, reproductions of Hengstenberg and Hävernick; as a specimen of the tone adopted by these writers, the following extract may suffice. “The book of Daniel is especially fitted to be a battle-field between faith and unbelief. It admits of no half-measures. It is either Divine or an imposture. To write any book under the name of another, and to give it out to be his, is, in any case, a forgery, dishonest in itself, and destructive of all trustworthiness. But the case as to the book of Daniel, if it were not his, would go far beyond even this. The writer, were he not Daniel, must have lied on a most frightful scale, ascribing to God prophecies which were never uttered, and miracles which are assumed never to have been wrought. In a word, the whole book would be one lie in the Name of God.” (Pusey, Daniel the Prophet, p. 1.)

Of late years however a great change has taken place in the policy of conservative theologians with respect to this book. When the critical theory was still new, it was easy to denounce it and to proclaim that it would soon be universally abandoned, but when the theory, so far from being overthrown, was confirmed by a long and important series of discoveries, some of the apologists began to suspect that they had slightly overstated the absurdity of "half-measures." The "middle path," which, as long as it was not needed, had appeared so contemptible, now acquired a strange fascination. Accordingly there commenced a succession of attempts to reconcile the results of criticism with orthodoxy. Concession after concession was made. Instead of labouring to "defend Daniel" from beginning to end, the apologists of the New School freely admitted that many things related in the book were unhistorical. But these things, it was explained, are interpolations, and do not in any way interfere with the truth of the rest. Thus Lenormant accepted the latter part of the book as genuine, but thought that the earlier chapters had been garbled by the scribes. The very first verse of Daniel contains, according to Lenormant, "a gross error." M. Babelon, in the new edition of Histoire ancienne de l'Orient, expresses himself thus. "Au reste, quand il s'agit des données historiques contenues dans le livre de Daniel, il ne faut jamais oublier ce fait capital que si ce livre est parfaitement authentique et incontestablement écrit à Babylone, nous n'en possédonz plus le texte original dans un état intact, mais seulement un remaniement écrit en partie en syro-chaldaïque, et fait vers le III<sup>e</sup> siècle avant l'ère chrétienne, par un transcriveur assez ignorant de l'histoire, qui a commis des interpolations et plusieurs confusions manifestes dans les noms des rois babyloniens" (Vol. IV. p. 438, note). Unfortunately neither Lenormant nor any other apologist of the New School has pointed out a criterion whereby to distinguish the "undeniably authentic" portions of Daniel from the "interpolations." Hence we find that scarcely any two of these apologists are agreed as to which pieces should be "defended" and which should be abandoned. The latter part of Daniel, which Lenormant pronounced genuine, is, according to some conservative theologians, manifestly quite late (see the Handbuch der theologischen Wissenschaften, herausgegeben von Otto Zöckler, 2nd ed. 1885, Vol. I. pp. 171—173).

Thus the "defenders of Daniel" have during the last few years been employed chiefly in cutting Daniel to pieces. But to pass all these theories in review is quite unnecessary, for the discordance between them is a sufficient proof of their arbitrariness.

Of modern monographs on Daniel the following are the most important :

BLEEK—“Die messianischen Weissagungen im Buche Daniel, mit besonderer Beziehung auf Auberlen’s Schrift,” in the Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie, 1860.

CHEYNE—Art. “Daniel,” in the 9th edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

CORNILL—“Die Siebzig Jahrwochen Daniels,” in Theologische Studien und Skizzen aus Ostpreussen, Vol. II. 1889.

FRANZ DELITZSCH—Art. “Daniel,” in Herzog’s Real-Encyclopädie, 2nd ed. 1878. [For Prof. Delitzsch’s rejection of the theory of the antiquity of Daniel, see his Messianic Prophecies, translated by Curtiss, 1880, p. 90, and his Old Testament History of Redemption, 1881, p. 153.]

DE WETTE—Art. “Daniel,” in the Allgemeine Encyclopädie von Ersch und Gruber, 1832.

GRAETZ—“Beiträge zur Sach- und Worterklärung des Buches Daniel,” in the Monatschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judenthums, 1871.

GRAF—Art. “Daniel,” in Schenkel’s Bibel-Lexikon, 1869.

HOFFMANN—“Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, König von Syrien,” publ. by Alfred Lorentz, Leipzig, 1873.

KUENEN—“Historisch-critisch onderzoeck naar het ontstaan en de verzameling van de Boeken des Ouden Verbonds,” 2nd ed. 1887—1889, Vol. II. pp. 446—508.

LENORMANT—“La divination et la science des présages chez les Chaldéens,” 1875, pp. 169—227.

NÖLDEKE—“Die alttestamentliche Litteratur,” 1868, pp. 216—234.

REUSS—“Die Geschichte der heiligen Schriften Alten Testaments,” 2nd ed., 1890, pp. 592—604.

SCHRADER—"Die Sage vom Wahnsinn Nebuchadnezar's," in the Jahrbücher für Protestantische Theologie, 1881.—"Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Old Testament," 1885—1888, Vol. II. pp. 124—136 [pp. 428—438 in the German edition].

SCHÜRER—"Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes," 1886—1890, Vol. II. pp. 613—616. [Transl. in Clark's Foreign Theological Library.]

Those who wish to see the controversy as to the date of Daniel stated in a short and popular form may consult a Tract entitled, "Notes on the Defence of the Book of Daniel, addressed to the Clergy, by a Clergyman," London, Simpkin and Marshall, 1878.

THE ORIGIN AND PURPOSE OF THE BOOK OF DANIEL.

THE evidence as to the origin of the Book of Daniel is of two kinds, external and internal. The external, as being the less complicated, may first be considered.

It has already been mentioned that in the Hebrew Scriptures Daniel has never occupied a place among the Prophetic Books, but is included in the third collection of sacred writings, called the Kēthūbīm or Hagiographa. Of the history of the Jewish Canon very little is known with certainty, but there is every reason to believe that the collection of Prophetic Books, from which lessons were read in the Synagogue, was definitely closed some time before the Hagiographa, of which the greater part had no place in the public services. That the collection of Prophetic Books cannot have been completed till some time after the Exile, is obvious, and on the supposition that Daniel was then known to the Jews, the exclusion of this book is wholly inexplicable<sup>1</sup>. The reasons assigned for it by the later Rabbins are evidently mere guesses. Thus when Maimonides tells us that there are eleven kinds of inspiration, and that Daniel is placed in the Hagiographa because his inspiration was inferior in quality to that of the Prophets, this is nothing but a theory intended to account for the present arrangement of the books. Hengstenberg and others have maintained that Daniel was not a “professional” prophet, but only a person possessed of the prophetic gift, and therefore could not be classed among the Prophets properly so called. This explanation, however, is refuted by the fact that Amos emphatically disclaims being a professional prophet (Amos vii. 14), yet his book was nevertheless placed among the prophetic writings. Hence it must be admitted that the exclusion of Daniel from the Prophetical collection is, to say the least, not very easy to reconcile with the theory of the antiquity of the book.

<sup>1</sup> In the prologue to Theodoret's Commentary on Daniel there is a very curious passage in which that writer inveighs fiercely against the Jews for not including Daniel among the prophets.

Still more important are the arguments which are drawn from the allusions to Daniel in other writings. The prophet Ezekiel, it is well known, speaks of a certain Daniel, who was proverbial for wisdom and righteousness (Ezek. xiv. 14, 20, xxviii. 3), but the phrase “Though Noah, Daniel and Job were in it,” certainly seems to imply that this Daniel was not a contemporary of Ezekiel, just as the very similar phrase of Jeremiah “Though Moses and Samuel stood before me” (Jer. xv. 1) would naturally have suggested to our minds that Samuel was not a contemporary of Jeremiah, even if we had possessed no direct evidence on the subject. Ezekiel, like other Old Testament writers (see, for example, 1 Kings v. 11), occasionally alludes to traditions of which nothing is known to us, and it is therefore impossible to decide who the Daniel was to whom reference is here made. Presumably Ezekiel believed him to be, like Noah and Job, a person of the remote past. Ewald’s dictum that the Daniel of Ezekiel must have lived in the Assyrian captivity has found few, if any, adherents (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, Vol. iv. p. 347, Propheten des Alten Bundes, Vol. III. p. 313). Nor can we safely conclude, with Smend (Der Prophet Ezechiel, p. 218), that the legend of Daniel was one of those ancient myths which the Israelites had in common with their heathen neighbours. Thus the passages in Ezekiel afford no means whatsoever for fixing the date of the book of Daniel.

On the supposition that the narrative in Daniel is historical, it is marvellous that it should be passed over in utter silence by all extant Jewish writers down to the latter half of the 2nd century B.C., that it should have left no trace in any of the later prophetic books, in Ezra, Chronicles, or Ecclesiasticus. It is, of course, possible in each particular case to imagine some reason for the omission of the subject, but the cumulative evidence derived from such omissions is not so easily set aside. Thus it has often been said that nothing can be concluded from the silence of Ben-Sirā in Ecclesiasticus xlix. But in order to realize the true state of the case we should consider how easy it would be to refute, from Jewish literature, any one who asserted that the book of Isaiah or that of Jeremiah was composed entirely in the Maccabean period. That the absence of external testimony to Daniel has been felt to be a real difficulty by the apologists themselves is shown by their desperate efforts to discover "traces of Daniel" in pre-Maccabean literature. But Hengstenberg is obliged to confess (Authentie, p. 277) that of these "traces" none is really conclusive<sup>1</sup>.

An attempt has often been made to compensate for the lack of external testimony, by arguing that if Daniel had really been composed in the Maccabean period, it could not possibly have been received into the Jewish Canon. But this is a mere begging of the question. For the theory that the Jewish Canon was closed before the Maccabean period rests upon no evidence whatsoever.

The earliest passage which can, with any probability, be regarded as an allusion to the book of Daniel, is found in the collection of Sibylline Verses III. 388 ff.

"Ηξει καὶ ποτ' [ἄπυστος εἰς] Ἀσσύδος ὄλβιον οὐδας ἀνὴρ πορφυρένην λώπην ἐπιειμένος ὥμοις ἄγριος, ἀλλοδίκης, φλογόεις· ἡγειρε γὰρ αὐτὸν πρόσθε κεραυνὸς φῶτα· κακὸν δὲ Ἀσήνη ζυγὸν ἔξει πᾶσα, πολὺν δὲ χθῶν πίεται φόνον ὁμβρηθεῖσα.
 ἀλλὰ καὶ ὡς πανάϊστον ἅπαντ' Ἀΐδης θεραπεύσει.
 ὃν δὴ περ γενεὴν αὐτὸς θέλει ἔξαπολέσσαι, ἐκ τῶν δὴ γενεῆς κείνου γένος ἔξαπολεῖται"

<sup>1</sup> That Ecclesiasticus xvii. 17 is not an allusion to Daniel, but a quotation from Deut. xxxii. 9 (see the LXX.), hardly requires to be stated. The importance which many apologists have attributed to this passage is a sufficient proof of the straits to which they were reduced.

ρίζαν ταν γε διδούνς, ἦν καὶ κόψει Βροτολογός ἐκ δέκα δὴ κεράτων, παρὰ δὲ φυτὸν ἄλλο φυτεύσει.
 κόψει πορφυρέης γενεῆς γενετῆρα μαχητὴν, καύτὸς ἀφ' νίῶν, ὃν ἐς ὁμόφρονα αἴσιου [ἄρρης], φθεῖται· καὶ τότε δὴ παραφυόμενον κέρας ἄρξει.

It is impossible here to enter upon an examination of this obscure passage, especially as it is more than probable that the text is in part corrupt. But it would appear that the piece in question dates from about 140 B.C., and that it contains allusions to Antiochus Epiphanes and to the "ten horns" of Dan. vii. 7, 20, 24. See Schürer, Gesch. d. jüd. Volkes II. 797—799.

The next allusion occurs in I. Macc. ii. 59, 60, where the dying priest Mattathias is represented as mentioning, among several other instances of the triumphs of righteous men, how Hananiah, Azariah, and Mishael were saved from the fire, and Daniel from the mouth of the lions (Dan. iii. vi.) To urge, as has often been done, that these words were actually uttered by Mattathias, is of course illegitimate, for with the historians of antiquity, both Greek and Oriental, it was a regular practice to invent speeches for their characters or at least to amplify and embellish the meagre reports of speeches handed down by tradition. That this was the practice of the author of I. Maccabees, is unquestionable, for to suppose that such speeches as that in chap. ii. 7—13 (to cite no others) are reported verbatim, would be the height of absurdity. But the reference to Daniel no doubt proves that the book existed in the time of the author of I. Maccabees (i.e. about 100 B.C.), and also that it was generally believed.

Subsequent references are so numerous and varied that it would be vain to specify them. One passage only, to which apologists have frequently appealed, calls for special notice. Josephus tells us (Antiq. xi. 8. 5) that Alexander the Great, after the capture of Gaza, came to Jerusalem, and was shewn the Book of Daniel by Yaddua the High Priest. From this no deduction can be drawn excepting that Josephus believed the book to be ancient. The whole account of Alexander's journey to Jerusalem has long ago been recognized as a fiction. It has been abundantly proved that as to the history of this period Josephus was extremely ill-informed, and it is no less certain that where genuine records failed him, he borrowed without scruple from untrustworthy sources and even from his own imagination.

In the New Testament, Daniel is mentioned once only, Matt. xxiv. 15, but the influence of the book is apparent almost everywhere, particularly in the Apocalypse. Dr Westcott (in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, Art. "Daniel") has pronounced that no writing in the Old Testament had so great a share in the development of Christianity as the book of Daniel. The common argument that the book must therefore be genuine, may appear quite satisfactory to the dogmatic theologian, but is not of a nature to convince students of history. For the more we realize how vast and how profound was the influence of Daniel in post-Maccabean times, the more difficult it is to believe that the book existed previously for wellnigh four centuries without exercising any perceptible influence whatsoever.

We now pass from the external to the internal evidence. I shall of course confine myself, as far as possible, to those parts of the book of which the meaning is clear, reserving obscure details for the Commentary.

When we endeavour to confront the statements in Daniel with the known facts of history, we cannot but be struck by the extreme paucity of the allusions made in this book to the political events of the period in which Daniel is represented as living. Even occurrences which must have seemed most important to a devout Israelite, such as the captivity of king Jehoiachin, the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and the Return of the Exiles under Cyrus, are either passed over in complete silence, or mentioned only in the vaguest terms<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> It is interesting to observe what ingenious attempts have been made to discover in Daniel hidden allusions to the politics of the time. Thus, when Nebuchadnezzar is troubled by his dream, this is because his mind had been preoccupied with the fear of a Persian invasion : when Daniel fasts for three weeks, this was due to his distress about the intrigues which were being carried on at the Persian court, in order to hinder the rebuilding of the Jewish Temple, etc., etc.

How different in this respect are the writings of Jeremiah and Ezekiel! Nor is the silence to be explained by the hypothesis that Daniel was a recluse or a man indifferent to the fate of his people. On the contrary, he lives in the midst of the world, at the courts of successive kings, and his zeal for "his people and his holy city" is intense (see chap. ix.).

This would in itself be very surprising, but the difficulty is greatly increased by the fact that of the small number of allusions to the political events of the period, the majority cannot be reconciled with known history.

At the very outset we are told that Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, besieged Jerusalem and plundered the Temple in the third year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah. Even if we suppose Nebuchadnezzar to be here called king by anticipation—for, according to Jer. xxv. 1, his first year coincided with the fourth year of Jehoiakim—the difficulty remains that of a siege of Jerusalem in Jehoiakim's third year, Jeremiah, a contemporary, says nothing. It was not till after the defeat of the Egyptian army at Carchemish on the Euphrates in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (Jer. xlvi. 2) that there could be any question of Nebuchadnezzar's invading Palestine, where for some years the Egyptians had enjoyed undisputed supremacy. Hengstenberg endeavours, as usual, to save the veracity of the book of Daniel by forcing the meaning of the text. He maintains that the statement "Nebuchadnezzar came to Jerusalem in the third year of Jehoiakim" means that Nebuchadnezzar set out on his expedition in that year, and that he did not reach Jerusalem till the year following, after the battle of Carchemish. Such an interpretation is, of course, no less contrary to Hebrew than to English usage. In order to prove that Nebuchadnezzar invaded Judah in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Hengstenberg appeals to the authority of the Babylonian historian Berossus, who lived soon after Alexander. Berossus, according to Hengstenberg, relates that Nabopalassar, on hearing that the governor whom he had set over Syria and Phoenicia had fallen away to the Egyptians, sent forth his son Nebuchadnezzar with an army. "In this campaign," says Hengstenberg, "the Egyptians were defeated at Carchemish, and Phoenicia and Syria came under the dominion of the Babylonians; the campaign was ended by the news of Nabopalassar's death" (Authentie, p. 55). Here Hengstenberg has been guilty of a serious misquotation. What Berossus really says is that when Nebuchadnezzar's father heard that the satrap who had been set over Egypt and the regions of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, had rebelled against him, he sent forth his son Nebuchadnezzar, etc. (Josephus, Antiq. x. 11. 1 and Contra Ap. i. 19). Berossus here assumes that Egypt, as well as Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, had already been conquered by the Chaldeans before the death of Nabopalassar and the battle of Carchemish—a notion contrary to all evidence. The passage is therefore altogether untrustworthy; in order to conceal its unworthiness Hengstenberg misquotes it, and then argues that it confirms the statement in Daniel. That Jehoiakim was a vassal of the Chaldeans during the latter part of his reign, is certain, but of a siege of Jerusalem and a plundering of the Temple in the reign of Jehoiakim, neither Jeremiah nor the book of Kings says a word, and in such a case the argument from silence is very strong, if not absolutely conclusive. The statement in II Chron. xxxvi. 6, 7 proves only that the idea in question existed among the Jews when the Chronicler wrote, i.e. long after the Exile, and thus agrees perfectly with the theory of the late origin of the book of Daniel.

The only Babylonian kings mentioned in Daniel are Nebuchadnezzar and his "son" Belshazzar, upon whose death the empire passes over to the Medes. As a matter of fact, Nebuchadnezzar was followed by Evil-Merodach (Amil-Maruduk) in 561, Nergal-shar-uṣur in 559, Lakhabbashi-Maruduk<sup>1</sup> and Nabūnāid in 554. This last king, who was not a descendant of Nebuchadnezzar, but belonged to a different family, reigned until 539 or 538, when Babylon was taken by Cyrus<sup>2</sup>. There is therefore no room for a king Belshazzar, who, according to lonisch-Assyrische Geschichte, p. 424.

<sup>1</sup> The name of this king, who reigned for a few months only, is very doubtful. He seems to be called Λα-Βεροσοάρδοχος by Berossus (Josephus, Contra Ap. i. 20). See Tieles's Baby-

<sup>2</sup> The exact date is uncertain. Nöldeke places the surrender of Babylon in the autumn of 539; see his Aufsätze zur persischen Geschichte, p. 22.

Daniel viii. 1, must have reigned considerably over a year, on the most moderate computation. Recent "defenders of Daniel" have accordingly identified Belshazzar with Bil-shar-usur, Nabūnāid's eldest son, who is mentioned in the inscriptions of his father, and who seems to have held a command in the Babylonian army (Tiele, Gesch. p. 463. Schrader, Cuneif. Inscr. pp. 433, 434). It has been asserted that Bil-shar-usur ruled conjointly with his father until the fall of Babylon, and in proof of this certain Babylonian tablets, found in 1876, have been confidently cited. Some of them are dated from the reign of Maruduk-shar-usur, who, it is argued, was identical with Bil-shar-usur. But Mr Boscawen, who carefully examined these tablets, very soon discovered that the above theory was untenable, since Maruduk-shar-usur, whoever he was, must have reigned before Nabūnāid<sup>1</sup>. Mr Boscawen therefore identifies him with Nergal-shar-usur. Hence we have no proof that Bil-shar-usur, son of Nabūnāid, ever bore the title of king, still less that he was supreme ruler. Cyrus, in his inscriptions, speaks of Nabūnāid alone as king at the time of the taking of Babylon. But the Belshazzar of Daniel is evidently supreme ruler, for documents are dated by the year of his accession (Dan. vii. 1, viii. 1), which certainly does not agree with the theory that his father was still alive and at the head of the state. Many apologists have sought to evade this argument by urging that in chap. v. Belshazzar offers the place of "third ruler in the kingdom" to any one who will explain the inscription on the wall. This, it is said, proves that Belshazzar was himself second ruler, not first. But the word translated "third ruler" occurs nowhere else, and its meaning is altogether uncertain. And even if it meant "third ruler," the argument based upon it would be worthless. For a man who can of his own authority make any one he pleases "third ruler in the kingdom" must obviously be supreme in the state, not a mere heir apparent ruling under his father<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Mr Boscawen's words are, "I at first considered that Marduk-šar-usur was Belshazzar. I have gone through a great number of tablets and checked them carefully, but I do not find that I can now hold to that idea." (Transactions of the Society of Biblical Archaeology, Vol. vi. p. 108, publ. in 1878.) Yet M. Babelon, in the His- toire Ancienne de l'Orient, Vol. iv. p. 438 (publ. in 1885), not only states in the most positive manner that Maruduk-shar-usur was identical with Belshazzar, but actually has the boldness to allege, as his authority, the very work in which Mr Boscawen has pronounced the identification to be impossible !!

The above difficulties are sufficiently serious, and would in the case of any ordinary book be thought decisive, but they shrink into insignificance in comparison with the statements as to "Darius the Mede." It need scarcely be said that of a Median king Darius reigning over Babylon before the accession of Cyrus, there is no trace whatsoever in history. Both Greek and Oriental sources agree in testifying that Cyrus put an end to the Median dynasty and annexed Media to his dominions several years before the taking of Babylon. Accordingly the "defenders of Daniel" are here reduced to the most desperate expedients. Thus Hengstenberg, who is followed by Pusey and others, brings forward a passage in the Greek lexicon of Harpocration, compiled, it would seem, long after the Christian era. Here it is said that "the daric was named not after Darius the father of Xerxes, as most men suppose, but after an older king." Later authors, for example the medieval lexicographer Suidas, have borrowed the passage. But such indefinite statements, made by late Greek writers and unsupported by the citation of any ancient authority, have no historical value. The "older king" of Harpocration is, in fact, a mere shadow, nor would any one who had not a hopeless cause to defend, think of invoking the aid of such a being. Equally wild is the theory which identifies the Darius of Daniel with Xenophon's Cyaxares the Second—of whose existence there is no proof, for the narrative in the Cyropaedia is obviously not intended to be taken as history. In order to justify the book of Daniel for bringing a king Darius upon the scene immediately after the overthrow of the Babylonian Empire,

<sup>1</sup> The older apologists, who lived before any one had heard of Bil-shar-usur, had no difficulty in identifying the Belshazzar of Daniel. Some, as for instance Zündel, pronounced him to be Evil-Merodach; others, with equal confidence, maintained that he was the Nabonnedus of Berossus (i.e. Nabūnāid). It would be interesting to know who is destined to be the Belshazzar of the apologists twenty years hence.

apologists have taken refuge in the hypothesis that the Darius of Daniel is not an independent sovereign, but a viceroy appointed by Cyrus. In support of this it is urged that Darius is said to have "received the kingdom" (chap. vi. 1), and to have been "made king" (ix. 1). But these phrases mean simply that he was "made king" by God, and that he "came into possession of the kingdom"<sup>1</sup>. To argue (as Hengstenberg, Pusey, Keil and countless other apologists have done) that Darius is here represented as a viceroy, is not only absurd in itself but is flagrantly at variance with the rest of the book. Thus, when Darius has signed the interdict, he is reminded that "it is a law of the Medes and Persians that no interdict nor statute which the king establisheth may be changed" (chap. vi. 16). When Darius issues a command "to all the peoples, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth" (chap. vi. 26), he is claiming precisely the same authority that is claimed on a similar occasion by Nebuchadnezzar (chap. iii. 29). Finally, as if to remove all possible doubt on the subject, we are told that "Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius, and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian" (chap. vi. 29).

After this it is needless to enumerate minor difficulties, for the above statements amply suffice to shew that the narrative is unhistorical, and cannot have been composed in the period of the Exile.

Innumerable attempts have been made to outweigh the historical difficulties in Daniel by bringing forward proofs that the author was minutely acquainted with the customs of ancient Babylon; but these proofs will be found, on examination, to be either irrelevant or purely imaginary.

Thus Lenormant (La Divination, pp. 169, 188) lays special stress upon Dan. ii., where Nebuchadnezzar consults the diviners on the subject of his dream; for this, we are informed, was a

<sup>1</sup> The use of passive verbs, such as קָרְבָּן, with the implied notion of God as the agent, is especially common in Daniel; thus it is said, in chap. v. 28, "thy kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians." As for אָתָה מִלְכָבָד קָרְבָּן "he received the kingdom," it is enough to say that the very same words are used by a Syriac writer to describe the accession of the Emperor Julian (see Hoffmann's Julianos der Abtrünnige, p. 5, line 10).

Babylonian custom which could not have been known to a later Palestinian writer. It is strange that Lenormant should have forgotten—what has often been remarked—that the custom in question, far from being peculiar to Babylon, appears already in Gen. xli., a chapter which, in some respects, bears a striking resemblance to Dan. ii. That the same custom continued in the East long after the Christian era, is well known.

Lenormant likewise claims for the author of Daniel great knowledge as to the details of the organization of the learned and sacerdotal caste (La Divination, p. 189). But in reality no details are given. That diviners, magicians, etc., attend upon Nebuchadnezzar, in the book of Daniel, is no matter for surprise, since magicians formed part of the regular personnel of an Oriental court, and the magic arts of Babylon, in particular, were celebrated throughout the ancient world. The allusions to these subjects in Daniel imply no special knowledge, but rather the reverse. Thus the learned men of Babylon are in Daniel repeatedly called "the Chaldeans," whereas in the cuneiform inscriptions, as in the historical parts of the Old Testament, this is the name of a nation, not of a learned caste<sup>1</sup>. And how are we to explain the assertion that Daniel, a strict Jew, was made chief of the heathen sages of Babylon (chaps. ii. 48, iv. 6)? It is amusing to observe that while Pusey has proved to his own satisfaction the credibility of this statement (Daniel, pp. 424 ff.), Lenormant, whose acquaintance with ancient Babylon was unquestionably superior to Pusey's, tells us that the position here assigned to Daniel is evidently impossible, and he proceeds to get over the difficulty by the usual expedient of supposing that the passages in question are interpolations (La Divination, p. 219).

It has also been stated that the presence of women at feasts (Dan. v. 2) is a custom characteristic of Babylon. This may be perfectly true, but it is a custom which survived for centuries till after the fall of the Babylonian empire. This is in itself a clear indication of the post-exilic date of the Book of Daniel." Cuneif. Inscr. p. 429.

<sup>1</sup> As to the term "Chaldeans" Prof. Schrader observes, "The signification wise men that we meet with in the Book of Daniel, is foreign to Assyrio-Babylonian usage and did not arise

after the overthrow of the old Babylonian Empire, as is proved by the testimony of Quintus Curtius (v. 1). And if the custom was known to a Roman writer who probably lived under Vespasian, why should it not have been known to a Palestinian writer who lived centuries earlier?

Another Babylonian practice mentioned in Daniel is the punishment of burning alive (chap. iii.). But since, in Jer. xxix. 22, Nebuchadnezzar is described as roasting offenders in the fire, and since this very chapter is elsewhere quoted by the author of Daniel (chap. ix. 2; cf. Jer. xxix. 10), there can be no difficulty in explaining whence his knowledge was derived.

Thus it will be seen that one proof after another breaks down, and it would be a waste of time to discuss arguments still more fanciful, of which a large and varied collection has been made by Mr Fuller in the Speaker's Commentary.

The result of this chapter has hitherto been mainly negative. We have seen that there is no external testimony to the Book of Daniel before the middle of the 2nd century before Christ, and that the narrative of Daniel is seriously at variance with the history of the period in which Daniel is represented as living. But it is fortunately possible for us to advance from negative to positive conclusions. It can be shewn that external evidence and internal evidence both point in the same direction, or in other words that the first half of the 2nd century before Christ—after which period the external testimony begins—is the only period which will explain the contents of the book.

The Book of Daniel is divided into two parts; the first consists of a series of narratives, the second of a series of prophetic visions. In the narratives Daniel is always mentioned in the third person, whereas in the visions he is himself the speaker. The narratives are evidently intended to be consecutive, in point of time, but they are very loosely connected with each other. Their most marked feature is the didactic purpose which appears throughout. In every one of these stories we see the righteous rewarded or the wicked signally punished, as the case may be. On the one hand Daniel and his three friends, the servants of the True God, though apparently helpless in the midst of the heathen, triumph over all opposition, while on the other hand the mightiest Gentile potentates are confounded and humbled to the dust. This would in itself suffice to indicate that the book was intended for the encouragement of the Jews at a time when they were being persecuted by Pagan rulers. And when we pass from the narratives to the visions, we find that this view is confirmed. For in the visions the final victory of the "Saints" over the Gentile powers is repeatedly insisted upon. Further examination shews that this victory of the Saints is to take place in the days of a Gentile king who will surpass all his predecessors in wickedness. He will arise out of the Fourth Gentile Empire, the Empire of the Greeks, and after cruelly persecuting the Jews he will be destroyed by a divine judgment. Thereupon God will set up an everlasting kingdom. It is especially important to observe that in these visions very little is said about the first three Gentile Empires, while the history of the Fourth is described at great length, and with increasing minuteness as we approach the time of "the king" whose crimes are so vividly set before us. Thus everything combines to shew that the Book of Daniel is, from beginning to end, an exhortation addressed to the pious Israelites in the days of the great religious struggle under Antiochus Epiphanes<sup>1</sup>.

It is however necessary to guard against a possible misconception. Though the author of Daniel has everywhere the <sup>1</sup> One of the latest commentators, Prof. Meinholt, in the Kurzgefasster Kommentar, has endeavoured to shew that while chaps. i. and viii.—xii. were composed in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, chaps. ii.—vi. are the work of a Jew who lived about 300 B.C., and have as their object the conversion of the Gentiles to Judaism. Prof. Meinholt discovers various "contradictions" between the two sets of chapters, but his arguments are extremely fanciful. His theory is examined and, in my opinion, completely refuted by Budde in the Theologische Literaturzeitung for 1888, No. 26 (see the review of Meinholt's Beiträge zur Erklärung des Buches Daniel). Here it is enough to say that Prof. Meinholt commits the fundamental error of assuming that a writer of the Maccabean age would necessarily make the situation of Daniel and his companions similar in every detail to the situation of the Jews under Antiochus.

circumstances of his own time in view, we cannot regard Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar, still less Darius the Mede, simply as portraits of Antiochus Epiphanes. The author is contending not against Antiochus personally but against the heathenism of which Antiochus was the champion. He justly considers the struggle between Antiochus and the faithful Jews as a struggle between opposing principles, and his object is to shew that under all circumstances the power of God must prevail over the powers of this world.

That the author does not address his contemporaries in his own name, after the manner of the ancient prophets, but clothes his teaching in the form of narratives and visions, is perfectly in accordance with the spirit of later Judaism. The belief that no more prophets were to be found among the people of God seems gradually to have established itself during those ages of Gentile oppression (Ps. lxxiv. 9). Loathing the present, the pious Jews naturally idealized the past. In their grief and humiliation, their minds continually reverted to the time when great signs and wonders had been wrought for Israel, when God did not keep silence but spake to His people by the mouth of His chosen messengers. In proportion as the distress increased, it seemed more and more certain that the long-promised deliverance must be close at hand, nor could it be doubted that the prophets of old had foreseen how and when that deliverance would be brought about. This idea is at the basis of all the apocalyptic literature which played so important a part in the history of Judaism and of which the Book of Daniel is the earliest known example. The genesis of this literature offers, it is true, a very difficult psychological problem. Some at least of the apocalyptic writers may have believed that they were inspired to reproduce lost revelations; but however we may account for the fact, it is certain that age after age men whose sincerity cannot be questioned put forth writings in the name of ancient prophets and sages. This is not the place to discuss apocalyptic literature in general; it may, however, be remarked that the production of these works continued till far down into the Middle Ages. I have already mentioned a Christian apocalypse of Daniel which apparently dates from the earlier part of the 11th century (see p. 3). There is also a Jewish apocalypse of Daniel, probably composed in the 9th century. It has been preserved in a Persian translation, which Zotenberg has published in Merx's Archiv für die wissenschaftliche Erforschung des Alten Testaments, Vol. I. (1869).

With regard to the sources used by the author of Daniel little can be known with certainty. The name Daniel was probably suggested by the book of Ezekiel, and some details of the story are unquestionably borrowed from the narrative of Joseph in Genesis. Jewish and perhaps Babylonian traditions may also have been employed to some extent. But it is altogether a mistake to class the story of Daniel with popular myths which grow up unconsciously in the course of ages. The strongly marked didactic character of the book must make this clear to all persons accustomed to historical investigation.

The literary form which the author has chosen is in every way suited to his purpose. The division of the work into sections more or less independent of each other—a division which gave rise in modern times to the false hypothesis of a composite authorship—is evidently intended to facilitate the diffusion of the book. In those days it was by being read aloud in public that books became known, and a series of separate narratives and visions is obviously better adapted for reading aloud than a continuous history. This explains also why the author so often seems to ignore events already narrated. It has been asked, for example, why in chap. ii. 2 and still more in chap. iv. 3 Nebuchadnezzar summons the Chaldean sages, instead of summoning Daniel whose superior wisdom had been so clearly proved. The real answer is that in each case the author constructs his narrative with a view to inculcating a particular lesson, and does not care to make the narratives strictly consistent. But the general spirit and tendency of the book are everywhere the same.

THE LINGUISTIC CHARACTER OF DANIEL.

THE literary and historical unity of Daniel, which I have endeavoured to set forth in the preceding chapter, appears at first sight to be strangely at variance with the fact that the book is written in two different languages. Nor is this all. The author of a book may have some special reason for employing different languages according to the nature of his subject, but no reason can be imagined for a writer abruptly passing from one language to another in the midst of a narrative, as is the case in Dan. ii. 4. The suddenness of the transition sufficiently refutes the theory that the author intended the Hebrew portions of the book for the learned, and the Aramaic portion for the common people; for how could the common people understand a narrative beginning in the middle of a dialogue? Nor can we admit that the author here introduces the Aramaic language because he believed it to be the court language at Babylon or the language of the Chaldean sages as distinguished from Daniel and his friends<sup>1</sup>. If this were the case, the author would surely not represent Nebuchadnezzar in chap. ii. 3 as addressing the Chaldeans in Hebrew, and in v. 26 as addressing Daniel in Aramaic. Why moreover, on the above theory, should Aramaic be the language in which Daniel records the first of his visions—a vision, be it observed, which he did not promulgate to the world, but “kept in his heart” (vii. 28)? Thus it will be seen that all attempts to explain the change of language on internal grounds, prove to be failures. The answer to the difficulty must be sought in the circumstances under which the book was produced and transmitted to us.

<sup>1</sup> The word אֲרָמִים “in Aramaic,” in Dan. ii. 4, appears to be an interpolation; see the Commentary on this passage.

All that we know of post-exilic Judaism favours the assumption that a Palestinian Jew of the Maccabean period, writing in the name of an ancient seer, would naturally employ the Hebrew language. That the Book of Enoch was originally written in Hebrew is at least probable; that the somewhat later Book of Jubilees was so, is quite certain. The same may be said even of works which made no claim to antiquity, such as the Book of Ben-Sirā, and the so-called Psalter of Solomon. Hence the hypothesis that Daniel was originally written in Hebrew throughout, is quite in accordance with analogy. At the same time we have to remember that the author lived in a time of intense excitement, and his book was evidently meant, not for a small circle, but for all "the holy people" (see especially xi. 33, xii. 3). His object was to produce an immediate and a powerful effect. Since however the Hebrew language was then unintelligible to the vulgar, or very imperfectly understood by them, the need of a translation would at once be felt. We cannot therefore regard it as improbable that the author himself, or one of his associates, issued an Aramaic version of the book, or at least of some parts of it. In any case the style of the Hebrew and of the Aramaic portions is so similar that we may confidently pronounce them to be products of the same school, if not of the same pen. But if the book was originally written throughout in Hebrew, why, it may be asked, has it reached us in its present form? The most plausible supposition is that a portion of the Hebrew text having been lost, a scribe filled up the gap by borrowing from the Aramaic version. This view, which is that of Lenormant, is strengthened by a consideration of the fact that under Antiochus Epiphanes a systematic attempt was made to destroy copies of the Pentateuch—an attempt which would almost necessarily entail the destruction of vast numbers of other Jewish writings, for no one can suppose that the Syrian soldiery employed in the work of extirpation were careful to distinguish copies of the Torah (of which they could not read a line) from other manuscripts found in the possession of Jews. Thus at the time when the book of Daniel was still new, when it existed only in a few copies, within the limits of a single district, it was exposed to peculiar perils. Its author and those who had first propagated it may have "fallen by sword and by flame, by captivity and by spoil," within a very few weeks of its completion, and shortly afterwards none but fragmentary copies may have been procurable. Out of these, it would seem, our present text was constructed. But no critic has been able to bring forward a satisfactory reason for believing the substance of the book to have undergone any extensive change, either by mutilation, displacement, or the introduction of extraneous matter. The Septuagint translator, at all events, had before him a manuscript in which the Aramaic portion began and ended precisely where it begins and ends in the Masoretic Text. This certainly appears to prove that the arrangement of our present text took place at a very early period. The mistakes of later copyists, in matters of detail, have, of course, nothing to do with this question.

The Hebrew of Daniel.

The history of the Hebrew language, as exhibited in the Old Testament, falls into two principal divisions—the period during which the language was in full vigour, and the period of decline. As long as there was a national kingdom the language remained comparatively free from foreign influence, but when Israel ceased to be a nation and became a religious community surrounded by peoples of alien speech, the pure Hebrew began, after a generation or two, to undergo change. Finally, about the 4th century B.C., Hebrew was superseded, in ordinary life, by Aramaic, and thenceforth survived only as the language of literature and religion. It must however be constantly kept in mind that all the post-exilic writers were more or less familiar with the ancient literature and often strove to imitate it. But since some were much more successful imitators than others, the later writings in the Old Testament vary greatly with respect to purity of style. Hence in assigning a date to Hebrew works, we have to remember that while the presence of late phrases is always an argument in favour of a late date, the absence of such phrases is no proof whatsoever of antiquity.

That the Hebrew of Daniel is, in its main features of style, quite unlike that of pre-exilic times, requires no demonstration. Nor does it bear any real resemblance to the language of Ezekiel or of the post-exilic prophets, as may be seen by comparing the visions of Daniel with those of Zechariah—in spite of the similarity of subject the difference of language is most marked. With Esther, of which the date is unknown, but which can scarcely have been written before the 3rd century B.C., Daniel has some peculiarities in common; nowhere in the Old Testament excepting in these two books do we find the Persian word פְּרַתְּמִים (Dan. i. 3. Esth. i. 3. vi. 9) and the Aramaic תָּקַנְתִּים (Dan. xi. 17. Esth. ix. 29. x. 2). But of all the Old Testament writings that which has most linguistic affinity with Daniel, is without doubt the Book of Chronicles—a work which was probably compiled about the middle or end of the 3rd century B.C. The resemblance in point of language is the more noteworthy because the matter and the plan of the two books are wholly different. The following are among the distinctive phrases which are found in both:—

בַּעֲזֵר פֶּן (to have power, be able), 3 times in Daniel and 4 in Chronicles—Dan. x. 8, 16. xi. 6. I Chr. xxix. 14. II Chr. ii. 5. xiii. 20. xxii. 9.

כַּי (how?) Dan. x. 17. I Chr. xiii. 12<sup>1</sup>.

הַתְּמַצֵּא אֶם (to help) Dan. x. 21. I Chr. xi. 10. II Chr. xvi. 9.

<sup>1</sup> The word is doubtless borrowed from the Aramaic dialect of Palestine, and bears the same relation to the Hebrew אָזֶק that the Bibl. Aram. חָזֶן (if) bears to the Hebr. בָּאֵן (Syr. en, Arab. in). אָזֶק appears frequently in the Christian Palestinian Lectionary (see below), e.g. page 331 הִזְכָּר אָזֶן יְתַמְלֹן, How then should the Scriptures be fulfilled?—p. 437 הִזְכָּר אָמְרֵין דְּמָשִׁיחָא הוּא בְּרֵה דְּרוּר, How do the scribes say that the Messiah is the Son of David? Sometimes it is וְהַזְכֵּר אֶת אָמֵר הָרָק אָזֶק אָזֶר לְנָא אָבָא, And how sayest thou, Shew us the Father?—p. 433 הָרָק צָרְקוֹן מִן דִּינָא דְּגַהֲנָא, How shall ye flee from the judgment of Gehenna? See also the Palestinian Targum (so-called Pseudo-Jonathan) Gen. iii. 9. וְהַזְכֵּר סְכָר בְּלֶבֶךְ לְאַיְטָמָרָא מִן קְדָמֵי אַנְתָּא כְּבָרְךָ בְּלֶבֶךְ לְאַיְטָמָרָא מִן קְדָמֵי And how thinkest thou in thy heart to hide thyself from my presence? The commoner form in this Targum is הַיְכָרֵן.

הַתְּמִכָּר (to associate oneself) Dan. xi. 6, 23. II Chr. xx. 35, 37. גַּנְחָנוּ שְׁלֹיו הֵן מְלֻכּוֹת Dan. xi. 21, cf. I Chr. xxix. 25.

בֶּלְאֱלֹהָה (any god, with a negative) Dan. xi. 37. II Chr. xxxii. 15.

The Hebrew of Daniel contains moreover a certain number of words or roots which occur nowhere else in the Old Testament, but which are used more or less frequently in the later Jewish literature. The principal of them are זָיל (age, generation) Dan. i. 10.

חִיב (to render guilty, condemn) Dan. i. 10.

גְּרֹעֲנִים (herbs) Dan. i. 16.

חַטְמָרָם (to be moved with anger) Dan. viii. 7; xi. 11.

נְחַפֵּךְ (to be decreed) Dan. ix. 24.

רִשְׁם (to write) Dan. x. 21.

מְקֻמָּצִים (hidden things, treasures) Dan. xi. 43. This word, which occurs only in Daniel, is from a root unknown in Biblical Hebrew, but common in Aramaic and in the Hebrew of the Rabbins.

אַפְדָּן (palace) Dan. xi. 45.

To these may be added one or two grammatical peculiarities, e.g. the form מְלֻכּוֹת Dan. viii. 22. It is well known that though abstract nouns in uth are common in the Old Testament, especially in the later books, they never have plurals of this form<sup>1</sup>. In Rabbinical Hebrew, on the contrary, we find not only גְּלָאתָה but from גְּלָאותָה, אֲדָאתָה but from אֲדָאותָה and some others. I may mention also the construction אֲחָדר קְרוּישׁ (instead of the usual אֲחָדר אַחֲרָה), which occurs twice in Dan. viii. 13. For this there is no analogy in Biblical Hebrew, but in the Mishnah we occasionally find such phrases as טָהֹרָה יְדָה Pēah iii. 3; see also Geiger's Lehrbuch zur Sprache der Mischnah, p. 53.

<sup>1</sup> חַנְקָה, or according to some edd. חַנְקִיּוֹת, in Jer. xxxvii. 16, is too obscure and uncertain to be regarded as an exception to this rule. Whatever the word may mean, it can scarcely be the plural of an abstract noun. The LXX. reads χερέθ.

Another feature which is characteristic of Rabbinical Hebrew and which appears in the Book of Daniel, is the using of Old Testament words in new and peculiar senses—a very natural thing at a time when the Hebrew language had ceased to be spoken and when the meaning of many uncommon words was therefore no longer distinctly remembered. The author of Daniel, like some of the later Rabbins, often inserts into his prose rare or exclusively poetical phrases borrowed from the ancient literature. Sometimes he gives them a meaning of his own, and it may be remarked that in a considerable proportion of such cases the expression seems to have been suggested by the story of Joseph in Genesis—an indirect but significant corroboration of the theory that the narrative of Daniel was to a certain extent modelled upon that of Joseph. The following are the terms which should specially be noted. It will be observed that most of them occur more than once in Daniel; they must therefore be regarded as characteristic.

בְּשִׂירִים Dan. i. 4; ii. 2—in all other Old Testament writings this is the name of the Chaldean nation. The author of Daniel uses it also for “wise men” or “members of the priestly caste.” See p. 21, note.

צָפִים Dan. i. 10. Gen. xl. 6 (nowhere else in the Old Testament). In Genesis the word means “sad, troubled in mind.” The author of Daniel applies it to physical unhealthiness produced by insufficient food.

מִרְטָפִים Dan. i. 20; ii. 2. Gen. xli. 8, 24. Exod. vii. 11, 22; viii. 3, 14, 15; ix. 11. The word is believed to be of Egyptian origin, and in the Pentateuch is used only of the magicians of Egypt. In Daniel it means magicians in general.

בְּשִׁלְוָה Dan. viii. 25; xi. 21, 24. The substantive שִׁלְוָה (Sing. and Plural) occurs nowhere else in the Old Testament but in Jer. xxii. 21. Ezek. xvi. 49. Ps. cxxii. 7. Prov. i. 32; xvii. 1, where it means “peace,” “security.” In Daniel בְּשִׁלְוָה is “unawares,” like the Syriac men shelyā.

על-גָּנוֹן Dan. xi. 20, 21, 38, cf. Gen. xl. 13 and Gen. xli. 13. In Genesis the phrase is used of restoration to a former status or position; in Daniel it must be taken in the vaguer sense "instead of him," as chap. xi. 38 proves.

חַלְקָלוֹת Dan. xi. 21, 34. In Jer. xxiii. 12 and Ps. xxxv. 6, the only other passages where it occurs, this word means "slippery, dangerous places." In Daniel it is applied to "guile," "treachery."

הַמְּמִיד Dan. viii. 11, 13; xi. 31; xii. 11. Other Biblical writers call the daily burnt-offering עֹלֶת הַמְּמִיד (Num. xxviii. 10 ff. Neh. x. 34), but in Daniel the simple הַמְּמִיד is used instead—so also in the Mishnah (e.g. Ta'anith iv. 6).

נֵיאָר Dan. xii. 5, 6, 7; cf. Gen. xli. 1, 2, 3. It is well known that in old Hebrew נֵיאָר always refer to the Nile and its streams, either literally or as a figure of rhetoric (Is. xxxiii. 21. Job xxviii. 10). Nowhere but in Daniel is any other river called נֵיאָר. This general use of the word appears again in Rabbinical literature.

In conclusion therefore it may be said that the Hebrew style of Daniel differs widely from that of exilic and pre-exilic times, and agrees, in its main features, with the latest historical prose in the Old Testament, while in some important details it approximates to the Hebrew of the Mishnah and the Talmud. At the same time the author borrows many isolated words and phrases from the Pentateuch and the Prophets, and this is precisely what we might expect to find in a book written by a Jew of the Maccabean age in the name of an ancient seer. It was natural that the work should appear in an antique garb, in "the holy language," but the idea of closely imitating the style of the prophetic writings would by no means necessarily occur to the author. He avoids indeed the wholesale introduction of modern words, such as we find in the Mishnah, but is far from being a purist. In fact among the Jews of those times a delicate perception of the differences of Hebrew style was not to be expected. The belief, for example, that Ecclesiastes was a genuine work of king Solomon could have arisen only among a people incapable of distinguishing between the infancy and the decrepitude of the Hebrew tongue.

The Aramaic of Daniel.

The Aramaic language, one of the principal branches of the Semitic stock, includes a multitude of dialects, which have at various times been spoken in Syria, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and some of the adjacent provinces. The Aramaic dialects are divided into two principal groups, the Eastern (including the dialects of Mesopotamia and Babylonia, i.e. Syriac, the Aramaic of the Babylonian Talmud, and Mandaitic) and the Western (including Biblical Aramaic, as also the dialects of the Jewish Targums, of the Samaritan Targums, of the Christian Palestinian Lectionary, of the Palestinian Talmud, and of the Palmyrene inscriptions). This distinction between the Eastern and Western dialects corresponds entirely to the geographical features and political history of the countries in question. Western Syria, intersected by numerous chains of hills, has from time immemorial been a land of small independent states, nor has it ever been politically united excepting when subjugated by some foreign power. On the other hand the countries upon the Euphrates and the Tigris were marked out by nature to be the seat of great centralized empires; intercourse with non-Semitic peoples was here unavoidable, and it is therefore not surprising that the Eastern dialects are, on the whole, less primitive than the Western.

The distinctive feature of the Eastern Aramaic dialects is that in the Imperfect Tense they form the 3rd pers. sing. masc. and the 3rd pers. plur. of both genders by prefixing n or l, whereas the West-Arameans, like all other Semites, here prefix y. The formation with n is universal in classical Syriac (i.e. the ancient dialect of Edessa in Western Mesopotamia) and is usual in Mandaitic, a dialect which was spoken, some 12 or 13 centuries ago, in Lower Babylonia. The Aramaic of the Babylonian Talmud sometimes uses n, but more commonly l, which appears to have arisen out of n by phonetic corruption<sup>1</sup>. Now when we consider the vast geographical separation between the dialect of Edessa and that of Lower Babylonia, and furthermore the impossibility of one dialect having borrowed from another its inflexions of the Imperfect, we can hardly doubt that this peculiar grammatical formation with n must have originated at a very early period, in any case many centuries before the Christian era, though the West-Aramaic formation with y is certainly older still.

Of West-Aramaic the most ancient documents, of any considerable extent, are the Aramaic portions in Ezra and Daniel. As to the date of the Aramaic portions of Ezra there is some difference of opinion, but that they do not all date from the time of Ezra himself is certain. According to Prof. Nöldeke, some of these pieces may perhaps have been composed in the Persian period, though in that case they were doubtless remodelled by later scribes (Die Semitischen Sprachen, p. 30). Thus the Aramaic in Ezra may be taken as representing, in the main, the dialect spoken by the Jews of Palestine in the 3rd century B.C.<sup>2</sup> This Jewish Aramaic cannot have differed greatly from the contemporaneous dialects of heathen Syria, for the Palmyrene inscriptions (the oldest of which date from about the Christian era) bear a striking resemblance to the Aramaic of the Bible.

The language of the Jewish Targums is a slightly modernized form of Biblical Aramaic; more modern still is the Aramaic of the Palestinian Talmud, commonly called the Talmud of Jerusalem. The Samaritan dialect (represented by the Samaritan Targums) and the Christian Palestinian dialect (represented by the Palestinian Lectionary) are also very nearly akin to Biblical Aramaic, though they are both decidedly less primitive<sup>3</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> It is, of course, conceivable that the n may here have arisen out of l, but this is very unlikely, since the l appears only in the Babylonian dialects, which in the matter of phonetics are certainly less primitive than classical Syriac.

<sup>2</sup> The once popular notion that the Jews of Palestine derived their Aramaic dialect from Babylonia, is now wholly abandoned. See Prof. Wright's Comparative Grammar, p. 16.

<sup>3</sup> Neither the Samaritan Targums nor the Palestinian Lectionary can be

Between the Aramaic in Ezra and that in Daniel the difference is very slight, much slighter than the difference which often exists between the language of authors living in the same age and country. This similarity may be due, in part at least, to corrections made by scribes, but such corrections, though they may seriously have affected certain details, cannot have altered the fundamental character of the dialect. The constant variations in orthography and the use of different grammatical forms with precisely the same meaning are in themselves a guarantee that there has been no general and systematic modification of the language. In one point only does a considerable change appear to have been made. It is well known that both in Ezra and Daniel the verb נָפַת (נִפְתַּח) invariably forms the Imperfect לְהֹוֵא (in Dan. iv. 22 לְהֹוֹה), pl. לְהֹוִין, לְהֹוֹיִן, according to the Babylonian fashion, whereas every other verb uses the West-Aramaic prefix ' . It is impossible to believe that this anomaly really existed in the spoken language, the more so as we have positive proof that the other West-Aramaic dialects, Jewish, Christian, and Pagan, employed the prefix ' in the Imperfect of נָפַת, just as in other verbs<sup>1</sup>. As the forms לְהֹוֵא etc. are found both in Ezra and Daniel we cannot ascribe them to a caprice on the part of the author. Nor are they due to the carelessness of scribes, since in that case the forms with l and those with y would occur promiscuously, as the prefixes n and l are used in Mandaitic and the Babylonian Talmud. The only remaining supposition is that the Jewish teachers deliberately altered the old forms יְהֹוֵא, יְהֹוֹן, and יְהֹוֹי, into forms with ' . Why they did so cannot be discovered with certainty, but it dated with certainty. They seem to have originated between the beginning of the 4th and the end of the 6th century after Christ.

<sup>1</sup> The Targum of Onkelos usually has יְהָיָה (Gen. ix. 11, 25; xvi. 12), much more rarely the full form יְהָיָה (Gen. xviii. 18); pl. masc. יְהָיָה (Gen. i. 29; ix. 15; xv. 5, 13); pl. fem. יְהָיָה (Gen. xli. 36; xlxi. 26. Exod. xxii. 23). The Samaritan Targum has יְהָיָה (Lev. xxv. 28, 40; xxvii. 12, 15, 21, 25); pl.

יְהָיָה (Lev. xxv. 44, 45); pl. f. יְהָיָה (Lev. xxvi. 33. Num. xxxv. 29; xxxvi. 4). The Palestinian Lectionary has נְהָיָה or נְהָיָה; pl. m. יְהָיָה or יְהָיָה; pl. f. יְהָיָה or יְהָיָה. The Palmyrene inscriptions have נְהָיָה (Fiscal Inscr. i. 10, 11); pl. m. יְהָיָה (id. ii. 3rd column, 24). The very rare use of לְהֹוֵי in the Palestinian Targum (e.g. Exod. xxii. 24) is either a corruption or else a mere imitation of Biblical Aramaic.

may be guessed. It is known with what awe the later Jews regarded the Divine Name יהוה; not only did they avoid pronouncing it, but even the number 15 must be written טו, not טין, because יְהִי is an abbreviation of יהוה. Now the pronunciation of the Imperfect of אָמַת was probably very similar to the Divine Name. It is therefore not impossible that the Aramaic portions of the Old Testament were revised in later times for the purpose of changing יהוה (יהוָה) into the harmless Babylonian form להוּ (להוּה). In the course of such a revision the plurals יהוּין and יהוּ might easily have been altered likewise.

The differences between Ezra and Daniel appear mostly in the pronouns; the chief variations may be seen from the following table—

	Forms common to both	Only in Ezra	Only in Daniel
They	{ Ezra v. 4. Dan. vii. 17 Kethib.	הַמֹּ�ן once, v. 11.	— them ( after a verb )		הַמֹּ�ן	{ הַמֹּ�ן אֲנָשָׁן once, vi. 25.
this, masc.	הַזֶּה
this, fem.			אֵזֶן
these			אֲלֹת or אֲלֹתִים
that, masc.		הַזֶּה
that, fem.		הַזֶּה	{ הַזֶּה for both genders.
those	הַזֶּהָן		הַזֶּהָן once, ii. 44

Another grammatical difference is that in Daniel the suffixes of the 2nd and 3rd persons plural are always כֶּן and חֶן respectively, whereas in Ezra these forms interchange with the older לֶם and מֶה. But from these phenomena no certain conclusion can be drawn as to date, for, not to mention the possibility of alteration by later scribes, it frequently happens that when two equivalent grammatical forms are in use at the same time, some writers employ one only, while others employ both indifferently. Still less is it allowable to found arguments, as to the priority of Ezra or of Daniel, upon any of those Babylonian or Persian words which happen to occur in the one but not in the other.

The principal points in which Biblical Aramaic differs from the Aramaic of the Targums are these—

1. The Causative and Reflexive conjugations of the verb (Haphel, Hithpeel, Hithpaal) have ה instead of the later נ. There is one exception in Ezra (הַנְּאָמֵן chap. v. 15), and nine in Daniel (chaps. ii. 45; iii. 1, 19; iv. 11, 16; v. 12; vi. 8; vii. 8, 15). In the Targums some forms with נ occur, but forms with נ are very much commoner.

2. Passives are sometimes formed by internal vowel change, both from the Peal (e.g. יִהְיֶה, יִחְיֶת, יִהְיֶבּ), and from the Haphel (e.g. הַעֲלֵל, הַקִּמֵּת, הַעֲלֵל, הַנִּתְחַדֵּשׁ). Similar Passives were still used in Syria in the 2nd century after Christ, as appears from the Fiscal Inscription of Palmyra<sup>1</sup>.

3. Some common particles have other forms, e.g. אם if (Targ. אִין); אם there is (Targ. אִית); פֶּמֶת there, only in Ezra (Targ. פֶּמֶת, as in Syriac); מִלֹּא but, except, after a negation (Targ. אַלְלָה).

4. The Imperfect is sometimes used in describing the past, e.g. Dan. iv. 2, 17, 33; v. 6; vi. 20; vii. 16. Similar cases appear in Hebrew, but the usage in Daniel is not necessarily a Hebraism, for we find the same thing in Arabic, mostly in writings of the early period. That the later Jewish Aramaic did not employ the Imperfect in this sense may, I think, be concluded from the fact that the Targums, though generally inclined to imitate the Hebrew closely, render an Imperfect by a Perfect or a Participle, where it is obviously a question of the past, e.g. Exod. xv. 1, 5; Deut. xxxii. 10 ff.; 1 Kings x. 16; 2 Kings iii. 25.

<sup>1</sup> With respect to the use of the ancient passive forms, Biblical Aramaic very nearly resembles the modern Arabic, in which isolated passive forms are still sometimes employed, although the passive has, in general, been supplanted by the reflexive (see Spitta, Grammatik des arabischen Vulgärdialectes von Aegypten, p. 193).

5. There is a considerable difference in the vocabulary. We must however be careful not to draw hasty conclusions from this fact, for it is obvious that the Aramaic parts of the Bible, owing to their limited extent, contain only a small proportion of the words in use at the time of the authors. The same thing is true, in a less degree, of the Targums, for though the Targums are very much more voluminous, they are written in a peculiarly stiff and artificial style, and moreover seem to have undergone later revisions. A single instance will shew what caution is here necessary. The particle נִ appears once only in Biblical Aramaic (נִנְהָרָה, Dan. iii. 12), whereas in the Targums it is extremely common, both with and without pronominal suffixes. But we have no right to argue from this fact that נִ was very much more usual in later times than at the period when Daniel was written. Its rarity in Biblical Aramaic may be accidental, while its frequent occurrence in the Targums is doubtless due to a pedantic imitation of the Hebrew use of נִ. In this case the "difference" between Biblical Aramaic and the Targums is illusive, and proves nothing as to the relative antiquity of the writings in question. Hence it is clear that lists of the particles, pronouns etc., which happen to appear in Biblical Aramaic but not in the Targums, and vice versa, would give a very false impression if taken as a criterion of the changes which the language actually underwent.

If we leave out of account those peculiarities of the Targums which belong, not to the language, but to the method adopted by the translators, we shall find that in reality the difference between the Aramaic of the Bible and that of the Targums is certainly not greater than the difference between the English of Shakespeare and that of Pope, or between the French of Calvin and that of Bossuet; yet in these cases the interval of time amounts to little more than a century.

A very difficult and much debated question is how far Biblical Aramaic was influenced by Hebrew. As a rule, philologists were formerly inclined to go very far in assuming the existence of Hebraisms, but many of the linguistic phenomena which were so regarded have been proved by recent discoveries to be genuine Aramaic. Thus the distinction between שׁ and ס is regularly kept up in Palmyrene, as in Biblical Aramaic, and though this does not necessarily prove that the two letters were still distinguished in pronunciation, it certainly proves that the use of שׁ in Biblical Aramaic is not due to Hebrew influence, as Prof. Kautzsch has maintained (Gramm. p. 24). There remain, however, some undeniable Hebraisms, e.g. יִגְלֶל Dan. ii. 10 (contrast בָּלֶל iii. 29), מַרְפָּם iv. 34, v. 23. The following words also seem to be of Hebrew origin— קָצֵב Dan. ii. 12, אֲמֹתָרִי ii. 29, מִנְחָה iii. 46, נִיחָזֵן ibid., חָנֵכָתִי iii. 2, הָאָלָה iii. 29, מְאוֹנָנִיא iv. 1, בְּזִירָה v. 20, בְּגָדָר v. 27, בְּגָדָר vi. 11, בְּגָדָר vii. 14, בְּגָדָר vii. 26. Whether the interrogative prefix הַ is a Hebraism appears doubtful, and the same may be said of the prohibitive אַל.

When and by whom the present vocalization was introduced into the Aramaic parts of the Bible, cannot of course be known. But it is evident that in many cases the Kethib represents a much more primitive pronunciation than the Keri, e.g. אָנָתָה (antā), Keri אָנָתָךְ — עַלְךָ ('älayk or 'älayikh) , Keri אַלְךָ — תְּלִיתְיָא — אַלְךָ, Keri אַלְתִּיתְךָ. Sometimes grammatical inaccuracies which probably were found already in the primitive text, have been corrected by the later vocalizers; thus הָן, the suffix of the 3rd pers. pl., was used indifferently for the masc. and for the fem., but has been marked with the vowel ē whenever it refers to a feminine noun. Similarly, in the 3rd pers. pl. of the Perfect of the verb, the termination ּ is used for both genders, but has been treated as ā by the vocalizers, when the subject is feminine. In many other respects the pronunciation represented by the vowel-points may differ from that of the authors themselves. One phenomenon which deserves special notice is that in several cases an originally long ā is expressed by Pathah, in a closed or half-closed syllable (e.g. קְלִיטָה, אֲמָתָה), whereas the word מְנֻן who ?, which certainly had a short vowel, is vocalized מְנֻן. Hence we may plausibly conjecture that at the time when the vocalization was finally settled, the Jews, like the modern Nestorians, pronounced ā short in closed and half-closed syllables, and therefore in such syllables were liable to interchange Kâmes and Pathah. Similar confusions are found in Nestorian manuscripts (Nöldeke, Syr. Gramm. p. 28).

Foreign Words in Daniel.

Both the Hebrew and Aramaic portions of Daniel contain a considerable number of words which are undoubtedly neither Hebrew nor Aramaic. These foreign words have been held by some writers to be a strong argument in favour of the antiquity of the book, by others they are regarded as proving that the author cannot have lived before the rise of the Macedonian Empire. The subject is in any case worthy of careful examination.

If the book, or any considerable part of it, were really composed at Babylon in the 6th century B.C., we might reasonably expect that a large proportion of the foreign words employed would be borrowed from the language of Babylonia, which, as is well known, was a dialect closely resembling Assyrian. But, as a matter of fact, Babylonian words are extremely rare in Daniel. Besides a few proper names (one of which, בָּלְשָׁנָאֵצֶר, the author evidently misunderstood), we find the words—שָׂגָנִים (rulers), פָּרָחָתָה (governors), בָּיְתָה (citadel, royal residence), בָּרְקָה (brightness), שִׁיבַּע (to deliver), and שְׁמֹן or שְׁמֹנָה (magician)<sup>1</sup>. Of these the first three occur repeatedly in some of the later books of the Old Testament, בָּרְקָה and שִׁיבַּע are used in the Targums, and שְׁמֹנָה appears, with a slight variation of form (ashōphā), in Syriac writings composed centuries after the Christian era. In no case therefore do the Assyrio-Babylonian words in Daniel indicate that the author had any personal knowledge of ancient Babylon.

Much larger is the number of words derived from the Persian. It is remarkable that these are employed, not with any special reference to Persian affairs, but quite promiscuously.

<sup>1</sup> Two or three words, of which the Babylonian origin is uncertain, are here omitted. The Babylonian proper names in Daniel prove nothing as to date, for some old Babylonian names were still in use a century before the Christian era; see the Zeitschrift für Assyriologie, Vol. III. pp. 129 ff.

Thus in the list of king Nebuchadnezzar's officials (chap. iii. 2) we find two undoubtedly Persian titles. It must of course appear in itself highly improbable that Persian titles were then used at the Babylonian court. On the other hand, the long domination of the Achaemenidae introduced Persian words into all the Aramaic-speaking countries and not least into Palestine. Of these words many must have continued in use during the ages after Alexander, though as time went on and as intercourse with the remote East became less frequent, some of them fell into desuetude. The numerous Persian words which we find in Syriac writers, were likewise, no doubt, borrowed mostly during the Achaemenian period. More than half of the Persian words in Daniel are common in Syriac also, although the oldest extant Syriac works are later, by some three centuries, than the time of the Maccabees.

That Daniel contains Greek words has long been recognized, even by orthodox commentators. In order to reconcile this fact with the theory of the antiquity of the book, it has been maintained that the names of the musical instruments קִתְרָת (κιθαρίς), פֶּנְתַּרְן (ψαλτήριον), and סֻמְפְּנִיה (συμφωνία) may have been borrowed from the Greeks by the Babylonians as early as the 6th century B.C. Such a supposition, if not absolutely impossible, is at least extremely precarious and wholly unsupported by the evidence of the cuneiform inscriptions<sup>1</sup>. Even if this negative argument be set aside, there remain the positive considerations that one of the terms in question, viz. συμφωνία, as the name of an instrument of music, is peculiar to late Greek, and that the συμφωνία is specially mentioned by Polybius as a favourite instrument with Antiochus Epiphanes<sup>2</sup>. This is an "undesigned coincidence" which may be recommended to the attention of apologists.

Some of the foreign words in Daniel are of unknown, or at least of very uncertain origin, e.g. מלָךְ, נֶבֶּךְ, מִקְמֵתְיָה, תַּרְבְּרִיאָה ; of such words, however, the majority are probably Persian. That they are unintelligible to us may be due partly to our imperfect knowledge of the ancient Persian language, and partly to the phonetic corruption which they underwent before they reached the author of Daniel. In a few cases, moreover, the spelling may have been altered by later scribes.

<sup>1</sup> "The musical instruments that are here mentioned," says Prof. Schrader, "are Greek, and hence their names are looked for in vain among cuneiform documents." (Schrader, Cuneiform Inscr. p. 431.)

<sup>2</sup> "Οτε δὲ τῶν νεωτέρων αἰσθοιτὸς τυπα συνευαχούμενος, οὐδεμίαν ἔμφασιν ποιήσας παρῆν ἐπικωμάζω μετὰ κερατίου καὶ συμφωνίας, ὥστε τοὺς πολλοὺς διὰ τὸ παράδοξον ἀνισταμένους φεύγειν." Fragm. of Bk. xxvi. p. 1151, ed. Hultsch.

THE SEPTUAGINT VERSION.

IT is usually admitted that the so-called Septuagint Version of the Old Testament, being the work of various translators and of several successive generations, is by no means of equal value throughout for purposes of textual criticism. It is therefore necessary, before entering upon the discussion of particular passages, to investigate the general character and history of the text in question.

In the study of the Septuagint text of Daniel we are met at once by the difficulty that this version has reached us in one manuscript only, the Codex Chisianus, which cannot be older than the 9th century, and is perhaps very much later. The best edition is that of Cozza, in his Sacrorum Bibliorum vetustissima fragmenta graeca et latina, Pars Tertia (Rome, 1877). Besides this direct witness, we have the Syriac Hexaplaric Version (a slavishly literal rendering of Origen's Hexaplaric text) made at Alexandria, in the years 616 and 617, by Paul, the Monophysite Bishop of Tellā-dhē-Mauzēlath, who is commonly called Paul of Tellā. A great part of this Syriac version of the Old Testament has been preserved in a MS. now at Milan; according to Ceriani, it probably dates from the 8th century (Codex Syro-Hexaplaris Ambrosianus photolithographice editus, 1874, see p. 140). A separate edition of Daniel, according to this Codex, was published, with a Latin translation, by Bugati in 1788.

In comparing the Greek with the Syriac text, we are immediately struck by their close resemblance to one another. This is most apparent in hopelessly corrupt passages, such as ix. 24—27, where they agree almost to a word. Even if we ignore the slighter clerical errors of the Codex Chisianus (such as ἐμβηθήσεσθε for ἐμβληθήσεσθε iii. 15—ἐπήκουσε for ἐπήχουσε vi. 21—ἀνα λὰς for ἀνατολὰς viii. 4), there can be no doubt that on the whole the Syriac text is the purer of the two. Firstly, a small number of the additions, borrowed chiefly from Theodotion's version, which have crept into the text of the Chisianus, are not found in the Syriac. Such are, εἰς γῆν Σεναάρ i. 2—καὶ οὐ διέλιπον οἱ ἐμβάλλοντες αὐτοὺς ὑπηρέται τοῦ βασιλέως καίοντες τὴν κάμινον iii. 46—ἔτι τοῦ λόγου ἐν τῷ στόματι τοῦ βασιλέως ὄντος iv. 28. On the other hand, there seems to be no certain case in which one of Theodotion's renderings is found in the Syriac text but not in the Chisianus.

Secondly, the Syriac has preserved several words and phrases, which have been omitted in the Chisianus through mere inadvertence. E.g.

ii. 28, 29.	... . . . .	خَلَعَ لَحْمَ سَهْ . . . .
	سَهْ . . . .	سَهْ عَلَى مَعْدُونَ
	سَهْ . . . .	خَلَعَ حَتَّى مَعْدُونَ
	سَهْ . . . .	خَلَعَ سَهْ فَوْزَ عَلَى مَعْدُونَ
ii. 41.	... . . . .	سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ
iv. 15.	... . . . .	سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ
v. 1.	... . . . .	سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ
vii. 6.	... . . . .	سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ
vii. 18.	... . . . .	سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ
	(that is, the Chisianus has ἔως τοῦ αἰώνος τῶν αἰώνων, instead of ἔως τοῦ αἰώνος καὶ ἔως τοῦ αἰώνος τῶν αἰώνων) viii. 5.	... . . . .	سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ
ix. 23.	... . . . .	سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ
xi. 16.	... . . . .	سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ سَهْ

On the other hand, there are but very few cases in which words wrongly omitted in the Syriac have been retained in the Chisianus; e.g. ἐν αὐτῷ ὅκουν καὶ ἐφώτιζον πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν iv. 8 (9)—οἱ διαλογισμοὶ μου vii. 15.

Thirdly, when variations of other kinds occur, the Syriac generally retains the older reading. E.g.

vii. 27. נִשְׁתָּוֹן (i.e. ψύστων), Chisianus ψύστω.

xi. 10. מַתָּאֵת נָא (i.e. κατασύρων), Chisianus κατὰ σύρων.

Exceptions are very rare, e.g.

iii. 3.  $\div$  καὶ ἔστησαν οἱ προγεγραμμένοι κατέναντι τῆς εἰκόνος
—The Syriac adds the gloss in the wrong place,

וְלֹא-א-הָיָה . × מַתָּאֵת נָא — אָמֵן
— נִשְׁתָּוֹן

Lastly, the critical signs introduced by Origen into the text—namely the asterisk \* to mark words wanting in the LXX. and supplied from the later versions (chiefly that of Theodotion), the obelus  $\div$  to mark words wanting in the Hebrew text, and the metobelus  $\times$  to mark the end of a phrase belonging to one of the two aforesaid categories—have, as a rule, been faithfully reproduced in the Syriac, whereas in the Chisianus they are often misplaced or altogether omitted.

By the comparison of these two Codices it is doubtless possible to recover, at least with tolerable accuracy, the source from which both are derived, that is, the text of Origen. But between Origen and the author, or authors, of the Greek translation there lies a period of some three centuries, and it is but too evident that during this time the text underwent manifold changes.

In order to reduce the Greek text, as far as possible, to its primitive form, we have first to eliminate the stories of Susanna and of Bel and the Dragon, which appear to have circulated independently before they were incorporated with the book of Daniel. But even when these stories have been set aside, there remains a great deal which cannot have belonged to the original Greek text. It is obvious, at a glance, that the

- xii. 1. χώραν for ῶραν—Bugati conjectures (with great improbability, it seems to me) that the translator read רַחֲם for רַע.
 — նψωθήσεται for ἐκσωθήσεται or some other compound of σωθήσεται.

Under this heading also must be placed those parallel renderings which have been inserted into the text, e.g.

- viii. 16. καὶ ἐκάλεσε καὶ εἶπεν, Γαβριὴλ, συνέτισον ἐκεῦνον τὴν ὄρασιν.
 xi. 13. ἐπ' αὐτὸν.
 xii. 2. καὶ αἰσχύνην.

Also words wrongly repeated, as

- vii. 8. ἐν τοῖς κέρασιν αὐτοῦ, taken from v. 7.

Finally, some passages, especially viii. 11, 12 and ix. 25—27, where the text is in great, if not inextricable, confusion.

II.

The variations possibly due to the translator necessarily fall into many subdivisions. First, there may be cases in which he intentionally altered the sense, but unhappily we are here on very uncertain ground, since it may generally be questioned at what stage in the process of transmission any such alteration was made. Thus, for instance, there can be little doubt that the substitution of τὴν πόλιν Σιών for צְדָקָה רִיעֵשׁ, in ix. 24, is intentional, for it seemed inappropriate to speak of the holy city of Daniel. But though the removal of this stumbling-block is probably due to the translator, it may perhaps have taken place before or after him.

The same thing applies to glosses and expansions of the text, which are very numerous, e.g.

- i. 21. ἔως τοῦ πρώτου ἔτους [τῆς βασιλείας] Κύρου βασιλέως [Περσῶν].
 vii. 1. τότε [Δανιὴλ] τὸ ὄραμα [ὅς εἰδεν] ἔγραψεν.
 vii. 24. διοίσει [κακοῖς].
 vii. 25. καὶ παραδοθήσεται [πάντα].

- viii. 3. κριὸν ἔνα [μέγαν].
 viii. 4. [πρὸς ἀνατολὰς καὶ] πρὸς βορρᾶν καὶ πρὸς δυσμὰς καὶ μεσημβρίαν.
 viii. 8. τέσσαρα [κέρατα], as also in v. 22.
 viii. 27. ἡμέρας [πολλάς].
 ix. 7. τῷ [λαῷ] Ἰσραὴλ.
 ix. 10. ἐνώπιον [Μωσῆ καὶ] ἡμῶν.
 ix. 19. ἐπὶ τὴν πόλιν σου [Σιὼν] καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν λαόν σου [Ἰσραὴλ].
 x. 12. ἐναντίον [κυρίου] τοῦ θεοῦ σου.
 x. 20. μετὰ τὸν στρατηγοῦ [βασιλέως] τῶν Περσῶν.
 xi. 15. καὶ οὐκ ἔσται [αὐτῷ] ἵσχυς εἰς τὸ ἀντιστῆναι [αὐτῷ].
 xii. 8. καὶ οὐ διενοήθην [παρ' αὐτὸν τὸν καιρὸν].

Omissions are, as might be expected, much less frequent than additions, and they are generally of still more uncertain origin, e.g.

- i. 17. ... אלה ארבעה נחן להם καὶ τοῖς νεανίσκοις ἔδωκεν...
 vii. 3. [גְּדוֹלָה]
       θηρία.
 viii. 5. על פני [כָּל־הָאָרֶץ] ἐπὶ προσώπου τῆς γῆς.
 viii. 27. ואני דניאל [נָהָיִת] ונהלתי
       καὶ ἦγὼ Δανιὴλ ἀσθενήσας...
 ix. 18, 19. כי על רחמי [הרבים]: אַדְנִי שְׁמַעְה [אֲדֻנִי קָלָה] ἀλλὰ διὰ τὸ σὸν ἔλεος κύριε σὺ ἵλατευσον.
 xi. 41. בְּאֶלְעָזֶר [בְּאֶלְעָזֶר] εἰς τὴν χώραν μου.
 xii. 9, 10. עד [עַד] קָצֵן: יְתִבְרֹג וַיְתַלְבֹּנו [וַיְתַלְבֹּנו] רַפִּים ἔως ἀν πειρασθῶσι καὶ ἀγιασθῶσι πολλοί.

Changes in the order of words are rare, e.g.

- vii. 8. ....
       קרן אחריו ועירה סלקת ביןיהון ἄλλο ἐν κέρας ἀνεφύη ἀνὰ μέσον αὐτῶν μικρόν (where ἄλλο and ἐν are perhaps doublets, the latter pointing to a reading חַדָּה cf. viii. 9).

- vii. 21. עברָא קָרְבָּ πόλεμον συνιστάμενον.
- vii. 24. קִומָם אַחֲרֵיהֶן.
μετὰ τούτους στήσεται.
- viii. 4. יְמָה וְצֹפְנוֹת πρὸς βορρᾶν καὶ πρὸς δυσμάς.
- xi. 36. יְדַבֵּר נְפָלָות
էֶלְאֶלְלָא λαλήσει.

Of free renderings, and passages in which the translator evidently guessed at the sense, almost every other verse supplies examples. Only a few characteristic instances can be given—

- i. 10. הַחִיבָּעָם אֶת רָאשֵׁי לְפָנָךְ καὶ κινδυνεύσω τῷ ὕδιῳ τραχήλῳ.
- vii. 28. רְשֻׁוּץ יְבָחַדְנוּ ἐκστάσει περιειχόμην.
- x. 21. מִיכָּאֵל שְׂמָךְ
Μιχαὴλ ὁ ἄγγελος.
- xi. 2. יְהִיעָר הַכֶּל אֶת מִלְכּוֹת יוֹם ἐπαναστήσεται παντὶ βασιλεῖ, Ἑλλήνων.
- xi. 5. נְגַנְבָּן לְקָנְבָּן βασιλείαν Αἰγύπτου, and so, throughout the chapter, נְגַנְבָּן is rendered by Αἴγυπτος.
- xi. 30. אַזְיִים קְתִיעִים
'Ρωμαῖοι (cf. the Targums on Numb. xxiv. 24).

Sometimes a personal pronoun in the genitive is inserted where there is no suffix in the original, e.g.

- viii. 23. τῶν ἀμαρτιῶν αὐτῶν — יְשָׁפֵחַם.
ix. 21. ἐν τῇ προσευχῇ μου — תְּחִלָּתָךְ.
xi. 7. ἐπὶ τὴν δύναμιν αὐτοῦ — אַלְתִּיתְלָא.

Sometimes a suffix is ignored, e.g.

- vii. 20. ἐπὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς — בְּרָאָשָׁה.

- vii. 26. τὴν ἔξουσίαν — תְּנַשֵּׁא.
 viii. 18. ἐπὶ πρόσωπον — עַל־פָּנֶיךָ.

In the use of the Article a like freedom prevails, e.g.

- i. 16. ἀπὸ τῶν ὄσπρεων — גָּרְעָנִים.
 x. 1. τὸ πλῆθος τὸ ἴσχυρόν — אֲבָה נָדוֹל.
 x. 3. τὰς τρεῖς ἑβδομάδας τῶν ἡμερῶν — שְׁלֹשָׁת שְׁבָעִים יְמִים.
 xii. 4. οἱ πολλοί — רַבִּים.
 xii. 11. τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως — מַמְשָׁךְ צְדִקָּה.

Conversely—

- viii. 27. αὕτη τῇ μὲλέτῃ — βασιλικά.
 xi. 31. — βδέλυγμα ερημώσεως.
 xii. 13. εἰς τὸν ἕβδομον — לְקָצֵן הַיּוֹם.

The Singular is sometimes put for the Plural, e.g.

- viii. 20. μέλοι μετεύς Μήδων καὶ Περσῶν — βασιλεὺς.
 xi. 13. εἴδη μέλοις — κατὰ συντέλειαν καιροῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ.
 xi. 17. μέλοι — θυγατέρα ἀνθρώπου.
 xi. 24. μέλοι — τὸν πόλιν τὴν ἴσχυράν.
 xi. 25. διάνοια (Syro-Hex.  i.e. διάνοιᾳ).
 xi. 39. μέλοις — καὶ κατακυριεύσει αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ πολύ (Syro-Hex. ).
 xi. 44. μέλοι — ἀκοή.

And sometimes, but more rarely, the Plural for the Singular, e.g.

- ix. 12. κακὰ γράψα — κακὰ μεγάλα.
 xi. 8. ἀποίσουσιν — אֲבָשָׁבָה.
 xi. 32. μιανοῦσιν — פְּתַנְיָה.

Mistakes on the part of the translator are numerous, e.g.

- i. 11. τῷ μέχε τῶν σεριφίμ — אֲשֶׁר μέחֶה שֶׁר הַסְּרִיףִים (i.e. pronouncing ).

- vii. 8. אַתְּ עָקָרְךָ — ἐξηράνθησαν.
- viii. 3, 4. .... בָּאֲמִרֵּה : רָאִיתִי .... — וַיַּבְחַחַת עַלָּה בָּאֲמִרֵּה : רָאִיתִי .... καὶ τὸ ὑψηλότερον ἀνέβαινε· μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα εἶδον ....
- ix. 6. אַל־לְלִים הָאָרֶץ — παντὶ ἔθνει ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς.
- xi. 33. יְהִינֵו לְנִכְיִם — συνήσουσιν εἰς πολλούς.
- xi. 45. תְּרֵא אַבִי קָרְשׁ — τοῦ ὅρους τῆς θελήσεως τοῦ ἀγίου (connecting צָבֵי with the Aramaic verb צָבָא).

III.

I now pass on to those cases in which the Greek translation presupposes a Hebrew or Aramaic reading different from that in the Masoretic text. Great caution is here necessary, for after all the proofs we have seen of the carelessness and incompetence of the translator, it must appear highly probable that he sometimes mis-read the text before him. Thus, for example, in xi. 17 we find τὸ ἐργον αὐτοῦ corresponding to מְלֹכָתוֹ — but it would be very rash to conclude that מְלֹכָתוֹ actually stood in the MS. from which the translation was made ; it is much more likely that the translator erred. Of such cases a long list might easily be drawn up, but there remain many passages in which we are obliged to assume a variant in the Hebrew, e.g.

- i. 3. אַשְׁפֵנָה — Αβιεσδρί (Syro-Hex. אַשְׁפֵנָה), or, according to some patristic citations, Αβριεσδρί, Αβδιεζδρί.
- viii. 8. חֻזּוֹת — ἐτερα (i.e. אחריות).
- viii. 9. יְתַר — καὶ ἐπάταξεν (וְתַּר).
- id. הַצְבִּי — βορρᾶν (הַצְבִּי).
- ix. 17. לְמַעַן אֲדֹנִי — ἐνεκεν τῶν δούλων σου δέσποτα (לְמַעַן עֲבָדֵךְ אֲדֹנִי)
- x. 17. מְעַתָּה — ἡ στένησα (מעדרת) cf. Ps. xviii. 37).
- xi. 1. עַמְרוֹ — εἰπεν (אמַר).
- xii. 3. מְצֻרִיקִי הַרְבִּים — οἱ κατισχύοντες τοὺς λόγους μου (מְחוּקִים דְּבָרִים).

The intrinsic merits of these readings cannot be here discussed, but most people will be disposed to admit that the above passages point to real variants in the Hebrew.

Since therefore the text which lay before the translator was not identical with the Masoretic, the question necessarily arises, What was the relation between these two texts? Is one to be regarded simply as a corrupt form of the other, or is each an independent witness? Unfortunately the question of the independence of the texts has frequently been confounded with the totally different question of their relative merit. The fact that in numberless cases the Hebrew reading on which the LXX. is based, is manifestly inferior to the reading in the Masoretic text, has led many people to conclude that all the variants of the LXX. are to be explained as corruptions. That this is not so can be proved by several passages, of which the following is perhaps the most conclusive. In viii. 24, 25 the Masoretic text has — a passage quite impossible to translate grammatically. In the LXX. we read — καὶ φθερεῖ δυναστὰς καὶ δῆμον ἀγίων· καὶ ἐπὶ τοὺς ἀγίους τὸ διανόημα αὐτοῦ καὶ εὐαδηθήσεται τὸ ψεῦδος ἐν ταῖς χερσὶν αὐτοῦ.... i.e. reading קדשים instead of קדשׁים ועל קדשים ועל שכלו ועם קדשים ועל קדשים are doublets, the latter being the true reading, for it is necessary to the sense, whereas the omission of קדשים produces no syntactical difficulty.

והשחית עצומים ועם קדשים : ועל שכלו והצליח מרמה בידו .....

If once it is admitted that the Hebrew text on which the LXX. is based, is independent of the Masoretic, it must always appear possible that a passage which has been corrupted in the one, may in the other have been preserved in a purer form—that is to say, each case must be decided on its own merits. The very fact that the Greek translator often missed the sense where it is perfectly plain to us, and where his text evidently agreed with the Masoretic, renders it highly improbable that he was capable of making plausible emendations. Where therefore the reading at the basis of the LXX. appears, upon careful examination, to be superior to the Masoretic text, we cannot but conclude that here an older reading has survived.

COMMENTARY.

CHAPTER I.

THIS Chapter not only serves as an introduction to the book, but also teaches several practical lessons. The conduct of Daniel and his friends, given up into the power of the Gentiles but strictly faithful to the religion of Israel, is evidently intended as an example. In dealing with the heathen world the most minute attention to the Divine Law is necessary, and will always meet with a reward. How well this teaching accords with the circumstances of the Maccabean period is at once apparent. It may seem strange that the point on which special stress is here laid is precisely that part of Judaism which moderns consider least essential and least valuable in a religious sense--the law of clean and unclean meats. But under Antiochus Epiphanes this was a vital matter. To the pious Jews of that time the eating of unlawful food seemed a crime as heinous as idolatry itself (J Macc. i. 62, 63). This feeling is of course something altogether different from the asceticism of medieval Christianity. "The king's food" is refused by Daniel, not because it is pleasant, but because it may contain unclean ingredients, whereas "herbs" offer no such danger<sup>1</sup>.

The statement in v. 1 that Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem in the third year of Jehoiakim seems to be due to a combination of II Kings xxiv. 1, 2 with II Chron. xxxvi. 6. In Kings the "three years" are not of course the first three years of Jehoiakim's reign, nor is there any mention of a siege. The idea that Jerusalem was captured under Jehoiakim appears first in Chronicles, but no date is given. The author of Daniel follows the account in Chronicles, at the same time assuming that the “three years” in Kings date from the beginning of Jehoiakim’s reign, and that “the bands of the Chaldeans” were a regular army commanded by Nebuchadnezzar.

<sup>1</sup> Similarly Josephus tells us that certain Jewish priests of his acquaintance, who had been sent to Rome, "did not forget their duty to God, and lived upon figs and nuts" (Vita Jos. 3).

1, 2. “In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came to Jerusalem and besieged it.” Elsewhere in Daniel the name Nebuchadnezzar is always written without נ; the older form נָבוּכְדְרָאצֵר (or נָבוּכְדְרָאצּוֹ Jer. xl ix. 28 Kēthib) which is usual in Jeremiah and Ezekiel and corresponds to the Nabū-kudurri-usur of the inscriptions and to the Ναβούκοδρόσορος of Abydenus, never occurs in this book. In v. 2, as in Chronicles, it is not clearly stated whether Jehoiakim was taken to Babylon, for the reference of the suffix in יְהִיּוּם is uncertain; Hitzig makes the suffix apply both to Jehoiakim and to the vessels, and renders בַּיִת אֱלֹהִי “to the land of his god,” citing Hos. ix. 3, 15. According to Von Lengerke the suffix refers to the vessels only. Ewald supposes some words to have fallen out and wishes to read, “Jehoiakim king of Judah, together with the noblest men of the land” etc. It must be admitted that the present construction of the sentence is awkward, for, if Hitzig be right, the word בַּיִת is used first in one sense and immediately afterwards in another, whereas if we adopt the view of Von Lengerke, the repetition וְאֶת-הָגָלִים is altogether superfluous. In any case the transportation of captives as well as of vessels, is presupposed in v. 3. מִקְנָת is for māndyāt, as in Neh. vii. 70. The form קִנְתָּה is contracted, in Aramaic fashion, from an original kăšdăwăt, as מִנְתָּה from māndyāt. קִנְתָּה from meaning “limit” (see v. 5) comes to mean “totality”; hence קִנְתָּה is “part of the whole,” i.e. “some,” cf. גְּבוּל “frontier,” hence “territory” (Exod. x. 14). The name שָׁמֵר is an archaism; it occurs nowhere else but Gen. x. 10; xi. 2; xiv. 1, 9. Josh. vii. 21. Is. xi. 11. Zech. v. 11. Writers of the exilic period speak of Babylonia as אֶרְץ בְּבֵל (Jer. li. 29), or אֶרְץ כְּשָׂדִים (Ezek. xii. 13), or simply (Is. xlvi. 20. Jer. l. 10). It has been supposed that שָׁמֵר is a corruption of Shumēr, the name given to South Babylonia in the inscriptions (see Schrader, Cuneiform Inscr. p. 118).

3—5. Of שָׁמֵן no satisfactory interpretation has hitherto been given. The LXX. has Ἀβιεσδρί according to the Codex Chisianus (Syro-Hex. אַבְנָזֵן). Lenormant thinks that these forms are corruptions of אֲשֶׁבְנָזֵר, which he explains as meaning "the goddess has formed the seed" (La Divination, p. 182). The phrase רַב סְרִיסִים must of course be identical with the term of vv. 7—11, since רַב is the Aramaic equivalent of שֶׁ. The phrase מִצְגָּנִי יִשְׂאָלִי is understood by most commentators as including both the following classes, the members of the royal family and the nobles. But it is equally permissible to suppose that the "Israelites" here form a class by themselves, and that by the royal family and the nobility. Verse 6 certainly implies that some of the youths in question were at least not Judaeans. The word פרחמים which occurs only here and in Esther, is probably the Persian fratama "first<sup>1</sup>." Symmachus and the P̄eshitta translate "Parthians," a view which might easily suggest itself at a time when the Parthians were the dominant race in Iran<sup>2</sup>. For instead of מִים instead of מִאים cf. Job xxxi. 7. מִשְׁפְּלִים is here "intelligent"—הַבִּין and הַשְׁבִּיל are used in Daniel both for "understand" and "teach," cf. the French apprendre. מִצְעָד, found only in Daniel, Chronicles, and Ecclesiastes, is doubtless borrowed from the Aramaic; the corresponding Hebrew form is מִצְעָד, which however has acquired the secondary meaning of "friend" (Prov. vii. 4). פְּנָה is "capacity" generally, both physical and mental. וַיַּלְפְּדוּם depends upon וַיַּאֲכָר in the preceding verse. קְפָר וַיְלַשֵּׁן כְּשָׂדִים "literature and the tongue of the Chaldeans," according to the Masoretic accentuation; Hitzig prefers to connect קְפָר closely with what follows, so that the whole phrase would be equivalent to קְפָר כְּשָׂדִים וַיְלַשֵּׁן. By "the Chaldeans" we are to understand the learned caste (cf. chap. ii. 1, 4), and their "tongue" must therefore be the language of their sacred books. It is, of course, vain to inquire what particular language the author has in view, e.g. whether he means to refer to Accadian as distinguished from the ordinary Assyrio-Babylonian. The existence of a learned or priestly language was a feature common to most, if not every one, of the great oriental monarchies. פָתַח “assign,” “appoint,” is properly a poetical term (Ps. lxi. 8. Job vii. 3), and, like many such terms, passed into the later prose; for “appointing” a person to an office it is used in v. 11, also in I Chron. ix. 29 and frequently in the Palestinian Talmud (cf. the Aramaic פָתַח Dan. ii. 24, 49; iii. 12). פָתַח was evidently supposed by the Masoretes to be connected with the Heb. פָתָה “morsel,” for which reason it is written פָתַחְנָן. But the term is no doubt Persian, and exists in Syriac in the form paṭbūghā. According to the historian Deinōn, who lived in the middle of the 4th century, B.C., ποτίβαξις was the name given to a repast of cakes and wine, such as was prepared for the kings of Persia<sup>1</sup>. The Persian word was probably patibāga (Sanskrit, pratibhāga) “portion”, and ποτίβαξις seems to represent a pronunciation in which the g was sounded like the modern Persian g (see De Lagarde, Gesammelte Abhandlungen, p. 73). קָרְשֵׁן is Singular, cf. קָרְשִׁין I Sam. xix. 4. וְלֹא־לִם is connected somewhat loosely with what precedes, “and (it was intended) to rear them” etc.; compare chap. ii. 16. מִקְצָתָם “at the end of them,” lit. “from the time when they should end.” The suffix ām here refers to a feminine noun, שָׁנִים, as is often the case (cf. מִקְצָתָם chap. viii. 9). For the Imperf. עָמְדוּ “they were to stand,” see Driver, Hebrew Tenses, 2nd ed. p. 51.

<sup>1</sup> The phrase martiyyā fratamā "foremost men" occurs several times in the Achaemenian inscriptions.

<sup>2</sup> The Targum on Esth. i. 3 (De Lagarde, Hagiographa Chaldaica, p. 202, line 8) renders פרתונאי by פרחמים which seems to be a corruption of פרתונאי "Parthians."

6, 7. The name Daniel (i.e. God is my judge) is written נָדָן in Ezek. xiv. 14, 20; xxviii. 3. In the form נָדָן it appears as the name of a son of David (I Chron. iii. 1), and as the name of a contemporary of Ezra (Ezra viii. 2. Neh. x. 7). The names חֲנָנִיָּה, מִשְׁאֵל, and עֲזָרִיָּה also appear among the contemporaries of Ezra (Neh. viii. 4; x. 3, 24), but this is probably accidental, since all three occur elsewhere, and we therefore have no proof that the author of Daniel intended to identify Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, with their namesakes in Nehemiah. קְרִישָׁאֵל is usually explained as meaning “Who is what God is?”, the שׁ being the relative particle. Hitzig takes it as a contraction of מִשְׁאֵל “Who is equal to God?”, the middle element being the verb שׁוֹה, cf. Is. xl. 25. It is true that שׁוה (Kal) is never construed as transitive, but in proper names the use of the verbal conjugations is often peculiar, e.g. פֶלְטִיחָה, and probably אַלְטִיאָה, שְׁזִיאָה. The change of name upon entering a new state of life was common in antiquity (Gen. xli. 45. II Kings xxiii. 34; xxiv. 17). For the phrase וְיִשְׂמַחְתֶּם לְקַם שָׁמָות cf. chap. v. 12. In chap. iv. 5 Daniel is said to have been called בֶלְטִשְׁאָצָר after the name of the god of Nebuchadnezzar, i.e. after בָּלָל (Is. xlvi. 1), and the Masoretic vocalization follows this etymology. But in reality בֶלְטִשְׁאָצָר is the Babylonian Balātsu-usur or Balātashu-usur (i.e. “protect thou his life”). Through what channel this name reached the author of Daniel it is of course impossible to say. The LXX. uses Βαλτάσαρ both for בֶלְטִשְׁאָצָר and שְׁרוּךְ and מִישְׁךְ are of uncertain origin; the former is explained by Friedr. Delitzsch as Shudur-Aku (i.e. “command of Aku,” the Moon-deity), and Schrader thinks this probable. שְׁבָדִינָבוּ has long ago been recognized as a corruption of עֲבָדִינָבוּ “servant of Nebo,” which is found in a bilingual (Assyrio-Aramaic) inscription (Schrader, Cuneiform Inscr. p. 429). Long after the Christian era the name עֲבָדָנוּ was borne by heathen Syrians (see Cureton’s Ancient Syriac Documents, p. 14 of the Syriac text, line 5). In the Palmyrene inscriptions also we find such names as בְּרָנָבוּ, נְבוֹכָד, and נְבוֹכָה (De Vogüé, N°. 24, 67, 73).

<sup>1</sup> See Athenaeus, Bk. xi. p. 508:— πνεός ὅππός καὶ κυπαρίσσου στέφανος καὶ Δεῖνων ἐν τρίτῳ Περσικῶν φησὶν οὕτως· οἶνος κεκραμένος ἐν ϕῷ χρυσῷ οὐδὲ ἔστι δὲ ποτίβαξις δρπος κριθίων καὶ πύ-

8—16. For the phrase וְיִשְׂמַחְתֶּם לְקַם עַל־לְבָבוֹ cf. Is. lvii. 1, 11. The root נָאַל “defile” occurs in old Hebrew poetry (Zeph. iii. 1. Is. lix. 3, perhaps also Job iii. 5); as a ritual term it appears first in post-exilic writings (e.g. Mal. i. 7, 12)—for the idea of ceremonial uncleanness the Pentateuch and Ezekiel employ טָמֵא. Verse 9 explains the reason of the mild answer that follows. For אֵשׁ לְפָה יְרָאָה (v. 10) “lest he should see,” cf. אֵשׁ לְפָה לְתֹועָה “lest there should be,” Ezra vii. 23; dalmā in this sense is common in Syriac. On אַעֲשִׂים see p. 31, and on לִיל and חַבָּב p. 30. These two latter words are borrowed from the Aramaic. In old Hebrew the root חָוֹב is unknown<sup>1</sup>. The ל

<sup>1</sup> In Ezek. xviii. 7 חָוֹב seems to be either a corruption of שׁוֹב, as Cornill has suggested, or else a mere ditto-graphy, the first two letters of חַבָּתוֹ

in לְפָנֶיךָ does not mean “before,” but is connected with the idea of a forfeit or debt (Aram. חֹבֶד) owed to some one; hence we may render, “and lest ye make my head a forfeit to the king.” תִּמְצֵאץ (v. 11), which occurs nowhere but in this chapter, is very obscure. That it is not a proper name but a title preceded by the definite article, is now generally admitted. The derivation from the Persian, according to which it means “wine-head” (i.e. keeper of the cellar), appears highly improbable, partly because the מלעַר is appointed by the chief of the eunuchs to have charge of Daniel, and supplies food as well as wine, partly because the Persian s in sara “head” could scarcely be represented by א. Schrader and Friedr. Delitzsch think that the word may possibly be the Assyrian massaru “guardian,” from the root נָצַר. In v. 12<sup>1</sup> זְרַעִים obviously has the same meaning as זְרַעִים in v. 16; the latter form occurs in the Talmud, whereas זְרַעִים is found here only, unless we regard it as merely a phonetic variation of זְרַעִים (Lev. xi. 37. Is. lxi. 11). It is of course possible that זְרַעִים may be a scribe’s mistake for זְרַעִים, but since in Daniel different grammatical forms are so often used in the same context without distinction of meaning, we have no right to assume a corruption<sup>2</sup>. Perhaps we may compare with זְרַעִים and זְרַעִים the forms קְפָתָשׁ Is. xxxiv. 13 and Prov. xxiv. 31 —also a kind of plant. The verb תְּרִיאֵנָה has the Aramaic vocalization, cf. תְּרִיאֵנָה Gen. xxvi. 29. Josh. vii. 9. II Sam. xiii. 12. In v. 15 בְּרִיאָה בְּשָׁר is a constructio ad sensum, referring to the suffix in בְּרִיאָה (so Hävernick); for the phrase cf. בְּרִיאָה בְּשָׁר Gen. xli. 2, 18. On the construction in v. 16 וַיְהִי נָשָׂא “so he was wont to take away,” see Driver, Tenses, p. 199.

having been repeated, and a <sup>ו</sup> inserted afterwards. The Arabic حُوب or حُوب “sin” (Koran iv. 2) is doubtless a loan-word from the Jewish Aramaic, the genuine Arabic equivalent of the Aramaic root being خَاب “to fail.”

<sup>1</sup> I cannot forego the pleasure of quoting Jerome’s remark on this verse. Incredibilis fidei magnitudo non solum sibi corpulentiam polliceri esse vilioris cibi sed et tempus statuere!

<sup>2</sup> Cf. for example ii. 1 and וְחַתְפָּעָם viii. 8 and יְמֻדְרָנָה and חַעֲמָדָנָה and וְחַטְפָּעָם ix. 5 and רְשָׁעָנוּ ix. 15, חַלְקָלוּת xi. 15 and זְרַעִים xi. 31, חַלְקָוּת xi. 21, 34 and חַלְקָוּת xi. 32.

17—20. בְּכָל־סִפְרֵי “in all kinds of books,” “in all kinds of visions,” cf. קָלַיְאָן Gen. ii. 9. The mention of visions and dreams has special reference to the following chapter and to the latter half of the book. In v. 18 לְמִקְצָת has precisely the same meaning as מִקְצָת (see v. 5). “So they stood before the king” (v. 19), i.e. they became his personal attendants. With עַל (v. 20) compare חֲמֹשׁ יְדֹות Gen. xliii. 34; for the comparative use of עַל see chap. xi. 5 and Eccles. i. 16. The absence of the conjunction in חֶרְטָמִים הָאֲשָׁפִים is in accordance with chap. v. 15. (see p. 31) is probably an Egyptian word, but its etymology is uncertain. It occurs only in the Pentateuch, where it always stands in the plural, and in the book of Daniel<sup>1</sup>. אֲשָׁפִים (with the Aramaic forms אֲשָׁפָ, אֲשָׁפִין, אֲשָׁפִיא) is found nowhere in the Old Testament but in Daniel; the word was originally derived from the Assyrian. It may here be remarked that in Daniel the various words used for diviners, magicians, etc., are nowhere distinguished from one another. When such persons appear, as in chaps. ii. 2; iv. 4; v. 7, they appear all together, so that we cannot say whether the author meant each term to stand for a separate class or whether he employed these terms indiscriminately. In ancient Babylon, as among the heathen Semites generally, there were many distinct kinds of divination and of magic. But the later Jews, like the Christians, regarding all such practices as sinful, seldom distinguished them accurately. The attempt of Lenormant to discover in Daniel allusions to the existence of five principal kinds of divination and magic, must be pronounced, by an impartial reader, altogether fanciful.

21. This short verse has given rise to much controversy. If יָיִן means “he remained alive” (Bertholdt, Nöldeke), this involves a contradiction to chap. x. 1. In order to avoid the difficulty, Hengstenberg explains, “he lived to see the first year of Cyrus,” i.e. he did not die till after the Return of the Exiles. But if the author of the book attached such importance to the Restoration in the first year of Cyrus, it must appear somewhat strange that he never alludes to the event, except indirectly in ix. 25. Kirmss and Hitzig substitute 'בָּבֶל' for 'בָּבֶן'. Ewald thinks that some words have fallen out, and reads "So Daniel was at the king's court until the first year of king Cyrus."

<sup>1</sup> Whether Cornill be right in reading חֶרְטָמִים for in כָּל־סִתְּהָוִם Ezek. xxviii. 8 cannot here be discussed.

CHAPTER II.

This piece is partly a narrative, partly an apocalypse. The narrative, as has often been observed, bears considerable resemblance to Gen. xli., and in a few places the verbal agreement is so close as to make it quite certain that the author of Daniel had in his mind the story of Joseph. In both stories, a heathen king has a dream which terrifies him; he sends for the magicians, but they are helpless, and at length the true interpretation is given by a foreign captive, who is at once raised to high honours. In matters of detail there are, of course, great differences, but this is merely what might have been expected<sup>1</sup>.

The meaning of Nebuchadnezzar's dream is of great importance for the right understanding of the book. That the four Gentile Empires represented by the image are identical with the Four Empires in chap. vii., is acknowledged by almost all interpreters both ancient and modern. But as to which Empires are meant there has been much disagreement.

In ancient times, two interpretations were current. The one is represented by Ephraim Syrus, who doubtless derived it, as he derived so much else, from Jewish tradition. According to this view, the Four Empires are (1) the Babylonian, (2) the Median, (3) the Persian, (4) the Greek or Macedonian. But the immense majority of the later Jews and of the Christian historical, and appears to have been borrowed in part from Daniel while in other respects it diverges.

<sup>1</sup> Compare the story related in Ibn Hishām's Life of Mohammed, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 9 ff., about Rabi'a ibn Naṣr, king of Yemen. It is obviously un-

Fathers held the Empires to be (1) the Babylonian, (2) the Medo-Persian, (3) the Greek, (4) the Roman<sup>1</sup>.

In the Middle Ages the second interpretation was usually accepted both by Christians and Jews. But it was not universal, for by this time a third interpretation had arisen, according to which the Fourth Empire is not the Roman, but the Mohammedan. Those who adopted this last theory, contrived to retain the number 4 by amalgamating two of the preceding Empires. Thus in the additional chapter which is found in the Coptic version of Daniel, the Four Empires are said to be (1) the Persian, (2) the Roman, (3) the Greek, (4) the Ishmaelite. Here the Babylonian Empire has been completely swallowed up by the Persian, and the Greek and Roman Empires are transposed. Again, Ben-Ezra tells us in his commentary on Daniel that Rabbi Saadia the Gāōn explained the "iron" as the Roman Empire and the "clay" mingled with the iron as the Ishmaelite. But this, Ben Ezra argues, is impossible, for how can the Roman and Ishmaelite Empires be treated as parts of the same Empire? Accordingly he concludes that the Third Empire comprises both the Greek and the Roman, and that the Fourth Empire is the Ishmaelite.

In modern times, the controversy as to the Four Empires has generally turned on the question whether the Fourth Empire is the Greek or the Roman. That it is the Greek has been maintained by almost all those who deny the antiquity of Daniel and by some of the most learned supporters of the traditional date, such as Dr Westcott. But most of the "defenders of Daniel" have thought it necessary to believe that the Fourth Empire is the Roman.

In order to explain the Four Empires rightly, we must be guided by the statements contained in the book of Daniel

<sup>1</sup> As a specimen of the ingenious arguments by which the Christian Fathers supported their theory of the Four Empires, it may be mentioned that Jerome regards the "brass" in Dan. ii. as representing the Greek Empire, because brass is the most resounding of metals, and thus symbolizes the eloquence of the Greek language. The view of Porphyry, according to whom the Third Empire is that of Alexander and the Fourth that of Alexander's successors (see Jerome on Dan. vii. 7), does not seem to rest on any tradition.

itself. That the First Empire is the Babylonian appears clearly from chap. ii. 37, 38, where Daniel, addressing Nebuchadnezzar as the representative of the Babylonian monarchy, declares, "Thou art the head of gold<sup>1</sup>". The Second Empire is not named either in chap. ii. or chap. vii. But since we are told that at the death of Belshazzar the Empire came into the hands of the Median king Darius (v. 30; vi. 1; ix. 1), there can be no doubt that the Second Empire is the Median. In chap. vi. 29 Darius the Mede is followed by Cyrus the Persian; hence the Third Empire is the Persian. The Fourth Empire can be no other than that of Alexander and his successors.

This view is fully confirmed by the visions in chaps. viii. and xi. The he-goat of chap. viii. is expressly stated to be the Greek Empire (v. 21), and this evidently corresponds to the Fourth Empire of chaps. ii. and vii.—firstly in that it is a "divided" empire (compare ii. 41 with viii. 22), secondly in that it ends with the rise and overthrow of a certain king symbolized by a "little horn" (compare vii. 8, 24 with viii. 9, 23). That the Greek Empire is to be the last of the Gentile Empires appears from chap. viii. 17, where the vision is said to refer to "the time of the end". Moreover in the last vision of all (chaps. x—xii), the rise and progress of the Greek Empire are related with many details, but nothing whatever is said of any subsequent Gentile Empire. Thus to introduce the Roman Empire into the book of Daniel is to set at nought the plainest rules of exegesis. That most of the later Jews and of the Christian Fathers believed the Fourth Empire to be the Roman, proves nothing as to its real meaning, for the belief was the natural result of their circumstances, and, as we have seen, when the Mohammedan Empire had to be accounted for, there were interpreters who declared the Fourth Empire to be the Mohammedan. In both cases the object in view was to justify the book of Daniel, not to explain it.

The objections which have been urged against the above interpretation are mainly as follows. It is alleged that in

<sup>1</sup> Strangely enough, Hitzig concludes from this verse that the First Empire of Dan. ii. is merely the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, and the Second Empire the reign of Belshazzar.

Daniel the Median Empire is not distinguished from the Persian, since the ram in chap. viii. represents “the kings of Media and Persia”. But the two Empires are not hereby identified, they are merely classed together, the difference between them being sufficiently indicated by the fact that one of the ram’s horns comes up after the other (v. 3). It is indeed stated that the he-goat (i.e. the Greek Empire) breaks both the horns of the ram (i.e. Media and Persia), but this does not imply that the Median and Persian Empires terminate together, any more than the breaking up of the whole image at once (ch. ii. 35) implies that all the four Gentile Empires terminate together.

Again it is urged that in chap. vi. 9, 13, 16 we read of “the law of the Medes and Persians”, not “the law of the Medes”. This objection is based upon a misunderstanding of the term “Empire”. In Daniel the existence of a nation is something quite different from its Empire or supremacy (טַלְשׁ), as may be seen by the fact that in chap. vii. 12, the first three beasts are deprived of their Empire, but are suffered to live. That the Medes and Persians had much in common was well known in antiquity, and it is therefore not surprising that they should be represented in Daniel and in Esther (chap. i. 19) as being governed by the same laws. But this does not by any means prove that the Median supremacy and the Persian supremacy are contemporaneous.

1—3. The events here related are said to have taken place in the second year of Nebuchadnezzar. In order to reconcile this statement with chap. i. 5, 18, various arbitrary hypotheses have been invented. Thus Rashi explains the second year of Nebuchadnezzar to mean “the second year after the destruction of the Temple”, while many modern writers (Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Zöckler and others) have taken refuge in the assumption that in chap. i. 1 and Jer. xxv. 1 Nebuchadnezzar is reigning conjointly with his father Nabopalassar and that “the second year” is the second year after Nabopalassar’s death. Others, as Ewald and Lenormant, emend the text, and read “the twelfth year”. For the use of the plural תְּלִמְוֹת where a Singular is meant, cf. חָנוּ נָאָשָׂא chap. iv. 3 and נָאָשָׂא vii. 1.

The phrases רוחו (v. 1) and וחתפם רוחו (v. 3) are evidently suggested by Gen. xli. 8. וְשָׁנְתוֹ נִזְהָח עַלְיוֹ is the Hebrew equivalent of נִזְהָח עַלְוָי (chap. vi. 19). נִזְהָח has here the secondary sense of being "past" or "over"; with this use of עַלְיוֹ cf. chap. x. 8, also Jer. viii. 18. Hos. xi. 8. Jon. ii. 8. That in v. 2 the חֲרֵטִים stand first in the list is certainly not accidental, but is due to Gen. xli. 8. The term מַכְשֶׁף, which was used among the Hebrews from a very early period (cf. Exod. xxii. 17), is commonly supposed to mean a "reciter of charms or incantations". Prof. Robertson Smith argues, in the Cambridge Journal of Philology, N°. 27, pp. 125, 126, that the root כָּשַׁף properly means "to cut" and that כָּשְׁפִים are "herbs or other drugs shredded into a magic brew". Hence כָּשְׁפִים (or מַכְשֶׁף) would be primarily a preparer of magical drugs.

4—6. On the sudden transition from Hebrew to Aramaic, see p. 26. The word אֲרָמִית “in Aramaic” is probably a gloss intended to warn the reader that what follows is in Aramaic<sup>1</sup>. With the phrase “O king, live for ever”, compare I Kings i. 31. Neh. ii. 3. In much later times the Sāsānian kings were addressed with the formula anōshak buwēlī “be immortal!” (Nöldeke, Tabarī, p. 366 note). In עַבְדֵּךְ (Kērī from a form ‘abdaik, the Shēvā, which replaces ā, is vocal (cf. מִלְכֵין v. 21 and מִלְכֵיא v. 37). The old termination aik or ayikh has been changed by the Masoretes into ākh, as usual<sup>2</sup>. On כִּשְׁרִיא (v. 2) see Kautzsch, Gramm. p. 28. The word אָזְדָּא (vv. 5, 8), for which Baer reads אָזְרָא, was understood by most of the older commentators as another form of אָלֵי “going”; so Theodotion renders ἀπέστη. But אָזְדָּא is no doubt the Persian azdā “certain”, “sure”, as Nöldeke has shewn (see Schrader, Cuneiform Inscr. p. 430). Hence we must render, “The word (which has gone forth) from me is sure”. הַקְמִין תַּחֲשְׂרוּ lit. “ye shall be made into (separate) limbs”, i.e. “ye shall be cut limb from

<sup>1</sup> This is the view of Lenormant, who points out that a precisely similar gloss occurs in Ezra iv. 7, where we should read, "The writing of the letter was in Aramaic, and accompanied by a translation—[ARAMAIC] Rehum the chancellor" etc.

<sup>2</sup> So also אִתְחַנָּא (pron. iθainā), chap. iii. 18, has been changed into אִתְחַנֵּא; but on the other hand we find אַלְעֲנָא (in some editions עַלְעֲנָא) Ezra iv. 12, 18; v. 17.

"limb"; thus the Peshitta translates תְּמִימָה תְּמִימָה; the Zend form is hañdāma, mod. Pers. andām, "limb". Instead of תְּמִימָה (Hithpeel) less correct editions have תְּמִימָה (Hithpaal). "וְבָנֵיתֶךָ נַעֲלֵי יְמִינְךָ מִזְמָרָה" "and your houses shall be made a dunghill", cf. Ezra vi. 11, where for נַעֲלֵי we find נַעֲלֵי; both forms are abstracts from the verb to defile, disgrace", common in later Jewish Aramaic. As to the custom in question, see II Kings x. 27. יְתִשְׁמַן (cf. יְתִשְׁלַמְתָּם Ezra iv. 21. Ezra v. 8) is a Hithpeel. "The doubling of the t", says Prof. Wright (Comparative Grammar, p. 254), "may be an attempt to compensate for the radical which has disappeared by contraction, and so to give the word something of the outward form of the normal תְּמִימָה; or it may be merely imitated from the Ethtaf'al (Ittaf'al)". In v. 6 תְּמִימָה (Haphel) is exactly equivalent in sense to the Pael (cf. v. 4). נִבְזֵחַ (cf. chap. v. 17) is doubtless a foreign word, probably Persian; whether Haug be right in deriving it from a hypothetical form nibajāā "gift" is uncertain (see Ewald's Jahrbücher der bibl. Wissenschaft 1853, p. 160<sup>1</sup>). The particle וְלֹא is here translated "therefore" by most commentators, as also in v. 9 and chap. iv. 24; elsewhere וְלֹא means "but", "only", in Biblical Aramaic, and Ewald thinks that here and in the two other passages cited the word has its ordinary sense. He therefore renders "only declare to me the dream and its interpretation."

7-11. תְּנִינִית “a second time” is properly an abstract noun formed from שֵׁנִי “second”; substantives and adjectives used as adverbs not unfrequently have the form of a construct state, though in reality they stand in the absolute (see Nöldeke, Mandaläische Grammatik, p. 201). The meaning of v. 8 seems to be, “I know of a surety that ye are gaining time, because ye have seen that certain is the word which I have spoken”, i.e. perceiving that I will take no direct refusal, ye seek to escape by delay. Instead of כַּי we also find וְזַרְצִיחֲבָב chap. iii. 24; for this adverbial use of כִּי cf. v. 47. The phrase זָבַן עֲדָנָא “to buy the time”, does not occur elsewhere; it is variously explained as meaning “to gain time” (Gesenius, De Wette, Von Lengerke), and “to profit by favourable opportunities” (Hävernick, Hitzig), after the analogy of  $\tauὸν καιρὸν ἔξαγοραζόμενοι$  Eph. v. 16. Col. iv. 5. The former of these interpretations is supported by the Peshitta which has אָשַׁר בְּעֵת “ye ask for time”; that the Syriac translator read בָּעֵין for בָּעֵת, as Graetz supposes, is very improbable. כִּי קָבֵל דִּי חִוְתָּוֹן is rendered by Hitzig “although ye have seen” (cf. chap. v. 22), but the ordinary meaning “because” is not inappropriate in this verse<sup>1</sup>. The form קָבֵל, properly meaning “before” (cf. chaps. iii. 3; v. 1, 5, 10) seems to be an old diminutive, corresponding to the Arabic kubaila<sup>2</sup>; with suffixes another form is used, לְקָבֵל v. 31 (Syr. ləkubhlākh, Arab. kablaka). In v. 9 can scarcely mean “your purpose is one and the same” (Von Lengerke, Hitzig), but rather “there is but one sentence (i.e. punishment) for you” (Ewald)—cf. וְר֣תָּה נְפָקַת in v. 13. דָת “judicial sentence” and hence “law”, is the Old Persian dāta (so also in Zend), mod. Pers. dād “justice”. In Biblical Aramaic דָת is treated as feminine on account of the final ת. The clause וְמָלָה בְּרֻכָּה וְנוּ does not stand in any very close logical connection with what precedes, “and (moreover) lying words and mischief have ye prepared” etc. For the Haphel הַמְנֻחָה the Kerî substitutes the Hithpaal, “ye have prepared yourselves to utter” etc. With עֲנָנָע, for עֲנָע, cf. מְנֻשָּׂע v. 21, מְנֻשָּׂעָנָה v. 30, יְנֻשָּׂעָנָה chap. iv. 14. This insertion of Nūn as a substitute for the doubling of a consonant is not rare in Biblical Aramaic and occurs sometimes in the later Targums (e.g. ינְדַע Eccles. viii. 5. יְנְדַעַנָּה Ps. ix. 21. מְנֻדָּעָה Ps. xix. 3)—in Syriac it is almost unknown, but is very common in the Mandaitic dialect<sup>3</sup>. In v. 10

<sup>1</sup> The word appears again in the Palestinian Targum, Deut. xxiii. 24, מחנָן “נְבוּזִית בֵּית מַוקְשָׁא”, “gifts for the Temple”, but in Jer. xl. 5 the Targum, as edited by De Lagarde, has מַחְנֵן “וְמַנְיזָבָן”.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. לְקָבֵל דִּי הָוּ בְּנָה “because he built”, in an Aramaic inscription of the Hauran (De Vogüé, N°. 3).

<sup>2</sup> Perhaps Syr. كَبِيلَة “under”, which is never used with suffixes, may also be a diminutive form, answering to tuhaita.

<sup>3</sup> It would of course be a mistake to regard the forms with the inserted n

as characteristic of any particular period. The probability is that both pronunciations long continued in use side by side. Thus we find that several Arabic words borrowed from the Aramaic are written sometimes with n, sometimes with the doubling, a. injāna or ijjāna “basin” (Syr. ag-gānā).

(less correctly אִיתָנָא Aithānā (Kērē chap. iii. 18), אִיתְכֹּן Aithēkōn (chap. ii. 26), אִיתְחַדֵּק Aithēkhaddēq (chap. iii. 14, 15), אִיתְהֻתִּי Aithēhūtī (chap. ii. 11), corresponds to Hebr. יִשְׁ ; the original form of the word was probably ȳthai (Nöldeke, Mand. Gram. p. 293) —in אִתְיַהְיָה the initial ' has lost its consonantal sound, but the original ending has been retained. On the form יִכְלֶל see p. 89. “Seeing that no great and mighty king hath asked” etc. “Great king” was a title borne by the kings of Assyria (11 Kings xviii. 28), and afterwards by the kings of Persia. Whether such forms as צָלָם Tzalām v. 34, קָרְנוֹן Karənōn v. 2, אֲבָנָה Abanāh v. 8) are to be regarded as Hebraisms, is doubtful, see Kautzsch, Gramm. p. 92<sup>1</sup>. With אַחֲרֵנִי “other” (v. 11) cf. אַחֲרֵנִי in the Targums (Onk. Num. xxiii. 13, see Merx, Chrestomathia Targumica, p. 25 — the pronunciation אַחֲרֵנִי is incorrect), and the Samaritan עַוְרֵן (= חֻוְרֵן), Lev. xxvii. 20. Num. xxiii. 27; the Christian Palestinian seems to weaken the ā of the last syllable to ē, חֻוְרֵן or חֻוְרֵנִי, so also the Syriac ܩܳܪܰܢ (East-Syriac 'hrēn, West-Syriac 'hrēn). The expression “gods whose dwelling is not with flesh (i.e. with mankind)” scarcely refers to any distinct class of deities, but is simply a confession of impotence on the part of the Chaldeans—no mortal man, only beings of a higher sphere, can perform the king’s request.

12—16. The wise men of Babylon having been condemned to death, Daniel and his friends, who seem not to have been present during the interview with the king, are sought out for slaughter. This shews that the “wise men” form a guild or association of which Daniel and his friends are members, but as to the precise nature of that association nothing is told us. With the phrase “הַחִיב עֲטָא וְעָם returned answer with counsel and prudence,” (v. 14) cf. Prov. xxvi. 17. The word עֲטָא (from an older form ‘atāt, Arab. عَطَّل) is one of the rare instances, in Aramaic, of a verbal noun in which the first radical is dropt; similar cases are עֲמָד (chap. iii. 13) or עֲמָד (id. v. 19) from the root עַמַּד, and עֲנֹתָה שְׁנָתָה (ch. vi. 19) from שָׁנַת. Why the first in the Pēshittā urah (from primitive ärh), Ezra viii. 21. See Nöldeke in the Z. D. M. G. xxii. 475.

<sup>1</sup> In the Christian Palestinian dialect we find מישק or מישך (pron. Mishk) (מישק "skin", מישך "counsel"). Similarly

vowel has been lengthened in אָמֵן and not in אָמַנְתִּי, אָמַנְתָּ, it is impossible to say. The chief of the executioners is here named אֶרְיָה which Schrader and Friedr. Delitzsch take to be the Babylonian Iri-Aku or Êri-Aku (i.e. servant of the Moon-god). The author of Daniel probably borrowed the name from Gen. xiv. 1. “Why is the decree so harsh on the part of the king?” (v. 15). מִחְצָבָה, contracted מִחְצָבָה (chap. iii. 22), is the Haphel participle of רָצַח, a root which denotes “stiffness”, “hardness”, or “shamelessness” (i.e. hardness of face)<sup>1</sup>. In v. 16, מִן (for which some editions wrongly have מִן!), stat. emphat. אֲמָנָה (chap. iii. 7), is derived from the Old Persian zarvan, cf. the late Hebr. זָמָן (Neh. ii. 6) and Arab. zaman or zamān; the Syr. zēbhan (stat. emphat. zabhnā), which occurs also in Palmyrene, comes nearer to the original Persian form. With תְּנִפְתָּלָה cf. Ezra vii. 20. This verb, like the corresponding Syriac form nettēl, appears only in the Imperfect and in the Infinitive מִנְטָל (Syr. mettal); in the Targums the n is assimilated, מִטָּל. Inf. מִתָּל. The phrase וְשָׁרָא לְהַחֲנִיהָ is elliptical, “and (this was) in order that he might tell” etc., cf. also v. 18 and chap. i. 5.

17—23. “The God of heaven” (v. 18), which occurs already in Gen. xxiv. 7, was a favourite expression among the post-exilic Jews (Ezra v. 11; vi. 9, 10; vii. 12, 21, 23. Neh. i. 4, 5; ii. 4, 20). רָצִים “secret” is a Persian word, in common use down to modern times; in Syriac also it is frequently employed, especially for “mystery” in the ecclesiastical sense. In v. 19 גָּלִיל is not the passive participle, which would be גָּלַח or גָּלָא, but an instance of the old Perfect Passive, corresponding to Arab. juliya; in v. 30 this same word is written גָּלִיל, cf. Ezra iv. 18, 23 and the plural form רָצִים Dan. iii. 21; vii. 9 (see Wright, Comp. Gramm. p. 225). וְנַהֲיוֹת עָתָה שְׁבָרָא “and the light dwelleth with Him” (v. 22); for נַהֲיוֹת (Syr. nahhīrū “light”) the Kērēt substitutes גָּהָרָא, which is the common form in later Jewish Aramaic—in chap. v. 11, 14, we find גָּהָרָא with the abstract ending. אָשָׁר is not a Perfect, but a Participle, passive in form in judgment”, “prudent”. The idea that this root expresses “haste” is due to the loose renderings of some ancient Versions in Dan. iii. 22.

<sup>1</sup> Hence, in the Targums and Talmud, the Adj. מִצְחָבָה “shameless”. On the other hand the Arab. hasif is used in a good sense viz. “firm”, “solid

though not in meaning; this use of the passive participle is frequent in Syriac, e.g. kēne “having obtained”, “possessed of”, as contrasted with kānē “obtaining”—similar is Hebr. לביש “having put on”, “clothed with”, and אָחַז “having grasped”, “holding” (Cant. iii. 8)<sup>1</sup>. In v. 23 Baer reads אָבְהָתִי with Hebrewized ending, but אָבְהָתִי is better attested. With יְהִבֶּת, shortened from יְהִבְּתָת עֲבֹרָת chap. iv. 32 and v. 22. The longer form is however commoner in Biblical Aramaic, and there can be little doubt that, at the time of the writers, the final ā was always pronounced (see חִתִּיתָה chap. ii. 41 bis). Instead of the הַוְשֵׁתָנָא of the ordinary editions, Baer has הַוְשֵׁתָנָא, which Kautzsch (Gramm. p. 60) regards as a pausal form of הַוְשֵׁתָנָא, cf. לְשִׁזְבֹּתָנָא chap. iii. 17<sup>2</sup>.

24—28. In הַעַלְמִי (so Baer, not הַעַלְמִי) the suffix is added to the Imperative in the same manner as in the Targums (e.g. ברִיכָּנִי Onk. Gen. xxvii. 34, 38. הַוְרָעִי Exod. xxxiii. 13), that is, without the intervening ai which here appears in Syriac. On הַגָּל (v. 25) for גָּל see what has been said on גָּל in v. 9. In הַתְּגִוָּרָתָה, “I have found”, the tone is thrown back (as in הַתְּגִוָּרָתָה v. 34, for הַתְּגִוָּרָת) and instead of the usual ē, the last syllable takes ā, owing to the guttural ח<sup>3</sup>; יְהִידָּה, in the place of the old Hebrew יְהִוָּדָה is probably, as Hitzig observes, a secondary formation from יְהִוָּדִי; so, in Arabic, yahūd “Jews” is the collective of yahūdī “a Jew”. כְּהַל “able” (v. 26) is evidently synonymous with יְכָלָל (chaps. iii. 17; iv. 34); both roots may be variations of כָּול, and the formation of כְּהַל would then be according to the analogy of Aram. רוֹצֵחַ Hebr. רֹחֵט, Aram. בְּהַת Hebr. בּוֹשֵׁחַ. בּוֹרִין (v. 27) “prognosticators”, properly “those who de-

<sup>1</sup> See Nöldeke, Syr. Gramm. p. 194, Mand. Gramm. p. 380. The frequency of this usage in Syriac may perhaps be due in part to Persian influence, since in Persian the past participle of all active verbs may be used either in an active or in a passive sense, e.g. karda “having done” or “done”.

<sup>2</sup> In those MSS. of the Targums which have the so-called Babylonian vocalization, the suffix of the 1st pers.

Pl. is always -ānā, never -ānā, both in verbs and nouns (Merx, Chrest. Targ. p. 12). It will be remembered that in the Babylonian vocalization no difference is made between Pathah and Səgōl.

<sup>3</sup> Prof. Kautzsch’s explanation of הַשְּׁבָכָת as being a Peal, not a Haphel (Gramm. p. 174), is certainly erroneous. See Nöldeke in the Göttingische gelehrt Anzeigen, 1884, p. 1019.

termine (what is doubtful)"; נָוַר is originally "to cut" (see v. 34), and in the Semitic languages, as is well known, the ideas of "cutting" and "determining" are closely allied. In v. 28 the words "He hath made known to king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be in the latter days" (cf. also vv. 29, 45) seem to have been suggested by Gen. xli. 25.

29—35. The king, while lying awake, was meditating as to the future, and the dream was afterwards sent by God for the purpose of enlightening him. With עַל־דְּבָרֶת דִּי (v. 30) "in order that", cf. Eccles. iii. 18; vii. 14; viii. 2. יְהֹוּעָן "they should make known", i.e. "that it (the interpretation) should be made known"; this vague use of the Plural, which is common in Daniel (e.g. iii. 4; iv. 13, 22, 29; v. 20, 29), is likewise a favourite construction in the Mishnah. For אָלֵךְ (v. 31) "behold!", which occurs again in chaps. iv. 7, 10; vii. 8, we find also אָלֵךְ chap. vii. 2, 5, 6, 7, 13; both words are probably phonetic variations of the same interjection, but which is the more primitive is uncertain. That אָלֵךְ is for אָנָה "see!" appears highly improbable. צְדָקָה, "that", is formed from צְדָקָה by the addition of the demonstrative n (Wright, Comp. Gramm. p. 111); cf. the Biblical Aramaic תְּמָמָה "there" (Arab. thamma) with the later תְּמָמָה (Nöldeke, Gött. gel. Anz. 1884, p. 1020). צְדָקָה "brightness", and hence in the Plural "cheerful appearance" (chap. v. 6, 9) is probably an Assyrio-Babylonian word (see Friedr. Delitzsch, Proleg. eines neuen Heb. und Aram. Wörterb. p. 152, and Nöldeke in the Z. D. M. G. XL. p. 732). גִּימָה "his appearance", which occurs again in chap. iii. 25, is the only certain trace in Aramaic of a root corresponding to Hebr. רָאָה; the word is found also in the Targums (e.g. אִיתָחָא שְׁפִירָה רְיוֹ "a woman of beautiful appearance", Onk. Deut. xxi. 11)<sup>1</sup>. That גִּימָה is not borrowed from the Hebrew is shewn by its form, which is contracted from רָאוּ (exactly resembling the synonymous חָזָה in חָזִינָה Dan. vii. 20); the disappearance of the radical נ is after the analogy of נְתָה for נְתַחָה, אֲמָתָה for אֲמַתָּה. In v. 34 the stone is described as striking the image "upon its feet", thus implying that the Gentile powers represented by the image are not contemporaneous but follow one upon another—the destruction of the Fourth Empire involves the complete overthrow of the Gentile supremacy. On בְּתַת (so Baer), instead of בְּתַת see p. 39. The form דָקֵק (v. 35) is difficult to explain. Elsewhere in Daniel the verb דָקַק is used in the Haphel only, and דָקֵק, if correctly pointed, must be from a root דָקַק or דָקַק equivalent to דָקַק. But whether דָקֵק be meant as transitive, like יִהְרַעֲנָא in v. 30, or as intransitive “they fell to pieces”, we cannot say. בְּכָל־הַדָּבָר “all together” is used also in the Targums (e.g. יְחִיבָּרוּ כְּחֶרְבָּא Ps. ii. 2), cf. the Hebr. בְּכָל־דָבָר Ezra ii. 64, and Syr. (מִתְמַמָּה) בְּכָל־דָבָר (for מִתְמַמָּה) “at once”. אַחֲרֵי is from a Sing. emphat. אַחֲרֵי, which is common in later Jewish Aramaic, and appears in Syriac as eddērā. In form this word resembles emmērā (cf. Ezra vi. 9) and seppērā (cf. Dan. iv. 30), but whether it is originally Aramaic may be doubted<sup>1</sup>. In בְּלֹאת we have a relic of the old form, בְּלֹאת, in which the נ was a consonant.

<sup>1</sup> From the Aramaic רְוַי the Persian rū, "face", for which there is no Aryan etymology, seems to be derived.

36—45. For the general meaning of vv. 36, 37, compare Jer. xxvii. 5, 6. Instead of the older דָרְרִין (pron. Darrin) the Keri has הָרִין, which is the ordinary form in Syriac, cf. also קָמִין (Keri) chap. iii. 3, זָעִין (K. זָעִין) v. 19, and (K.) דָאנִין (Keri) Ezra vii. 25; but in the stat. emphat. of the Plural the נ is allowed to stand (קָמִין, Dan. vii. 16). In v. 39 אַחֲרֵי, stat. absol. fem. of אַחֲרָה, corresponds to the אַחֲרֵי of the Targums (Onk. Gen. xxvi. 21, 22), to the Samaritan חָרֵי (Num. xiv. 24), and to the Christian Palestinian חָרֵיתא (stat. emphat. חָרֵיתא). בְּרֻעָה “lower than thou”—for the stat. emphat. the Keri has the absol. נְרֻעָה (cf. the Targum, I Esth. i. 2, אַרְעָה מִינָה); both forms are substantival (“the ground”, i.e. lowness), though they are used in the place of an adjective, and so the Hebrew טָרָוָם “height” is used for “high” (Ps. x. 5; xcii. 9). That the Median Empire should be described as “lower”, i.e. less powerful, than the Babylonian, is natural, for of the Median Empire next to nothing was known in the time of the author, whereas the greatness of Babylon was well remembered. Of the Persian Empire we are told that it bears rule “over all the earth”. Cf. Ezra i. 2, and the book of Esther passim. As in chap. vii., the author dismisses the first three Empires very briefly and hastens on to describe the Fourth, the only one which had a practical interest for himself and his readers. In both chapters great stress is laid upon the conquering power of the Fourth Empire, which is to “crush” all opposition (cf. v. 40 with chap. vii. 23). But here much fewer details are given than in chap. vii.; no mention is made of Antiochus, and the last days of Gentile supremacy are depicted only in general terms—the Gentile Empire will be divided, some parts being stronger than others. In v. 40 יְהִי קָלְקָבֵל is rendered “even as” by Gesenius, Von Lengerke, Ewald, and Hitzig, but it seems more natural to take the phrase in its usual sense—the author gives the reason of the foregoing comparison, “And there shall be a Fourth Empire, strong as iron, forasmuch as iron crusheth and breaketh all” etc. At the beginning of vv. 41 and 43, יְהִי is used as in chap. iv. 20, 23<sup>1</sup>, i.e. “(the fact) that thou sawest . . . . (signifies that) it shall be a divided Empire, and (a portion) of the firmness of the iron shall be in it, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with the miry clay”. That נֶצֶחַת is “firmness” (cf. יְאִיֵּב “sure”) seems more probable than that it means “nature”, from נֶצֶב “to plant”. With מִקְנָצָת מִלְכֹותָא (v. 42) “part of the Empire”, cf. chap. i. 2. At the beginning of v. 43 the Keri has יְהִי, for יְהִי, which is in accordance with chap. iv. 23. “They shall be mingling themselves by marriage alliances”—this, the traditional Jewish interpretation, doubtless gives the real meaning<sup>2</sup>; the reference is to the marriages between the Ptolemies and the Seleucidae (chap. xi. 6, 17); for the expression זָרָע אֲגַשָּׁא cf. Jer. xxxi.

<sup>1</sup> In Arabic we find the forms andar, from Aram. בְּרַדְרָא or أَنْدَرْ with dissimilation, and baidar, from بְּרַדְרָא (= بَيْتَ رَدَرَى); see the note by Fleischer in Levy's Wörterb. über die Targumim, i. 417, b. Prof. De Lagarde

(Gesammelte Abhandlungen, p. 10) suggests that נְרֻעָה is an Iranian word, which is of course quite possible, though the Arabic forms prove nothing in favour of the hypothesis.

<sup>1</sup> Compare the Syriac construction—

מִלְכָה מִלְכָה בְּאַת
מִלְכָה מִלְכָה בְּאַת
מִלְכָה מִלְכָה בְּאַת

“and that I am not veiled (is) because the veil of corruption is taken away from me” (Wright, Apocryphal Acts, p. 26 bottom).

<sup>2</sup> So Rashi translates, though he makes a wrong application—מתחתנים יְהִי עַם שָׂאָר הַאֲמֹתָה.

26. “like as”, exactly corresponds to the Palmyrene “הַאֲכָרִי” (De Vogüé, N°. 71—“הַיְכֵרִי כְּתַבְתִּי” (according as I have written”). In vv. 44 and 45 the Divine Kingdom is portrayed. It is to be set up “in the days of those kings”, that is, when the Greek Empire is in a state of division, and it will last for ever. Of a personal king nothing is said, but the eternal sovereignty of Israel is put prominently forward—“the kingdom shall not be left to another people”. Instead of מִקְםִים, which occurs again in chap. iv. 14, we find also מִקְמִים! v. 21; vi. 16. The first part of v. 45 should probably be connected with v. 44 (so Von Lengerke, Ewald), “it shall crush and destroy all these kingdoms, but as for it, it shall abide for ever, forasmuch as thou sawest that from the mountain a stone was cut” etc. In v. 45 the word מִקְמָת certainly does not stand where we should have expected it, but whether Ewald be justified in altering the text according to the LXX., so as to place מִקְמָת at the head of the list, may be doubted<sup>1</sup>. The verse ends with a solemn statement of the truth of the revelation—“A great God hath made known to the king what shall be hereafter, and certain is the dream and sure its interpretation”. מְהִימָן (Syr. mēhaiman), which occurs again in chap. vi. 5, is the passive participle of הִמֵּן (chap. vi. 25), a verb which seems to be borrowed from the Hebr. הִמֵּן.

46—49. The interpretation ended, Nebuchadnezzar falls down before Daniel and honours him as a god. We need not stop to inquire whether a strict monotheist would suffer himself to be thus worshipped, for the whole description is evidently ideal—Nebuchadnezzar at the feet of Daniel represents the Gentile power humbled before Israel (cf. Is. xlix. 23; lx. 14). The king’s homage, though ostensibly paid to Daniel, is in reality paid to Daniel’s God (v. 47). Very similar is the fabulous story in Josephus (Antiq. xi. 8. 5), where Alexander prostrates himself before the Jewish High Priest. In v. 46 נָפְךָ, which properly means “to pour” drink-offerings (Hebr. נָפַךְ cf. Ezra vii. 17), seems to be used of oblations generally. In v. 47 מִזְכָּרֶת דֵּי is elliptical, “(I know) of a truth that” etc. מְדֹה, for which some MSS. read מְרָא as in ch. v. 23, has the vocalization of a Participle Peal. The form מְרָא “my lord” (ch. iv. 16, 21, Kethib) shews that in the time of the author the נ retained its consonantal sound<sup>1</sup>. In v. 48 the words יִרְבֶּן סָגֵנִין depend upon חַשְׁלָטָה, i.e. “he made him rule over all the province of Babylon, and (appointed him) chief governor” etc. סָגֵנִים (Hebr. סָגֵנִים), which never occurs in the Singular in the Old Testament, is from the Babylonian shaknu “governor” (shakānu, “to place”, “to appoint”, see Schrader, Cuneiform Inscr. p. 411). Daniel, it would seem, wishing to remain “at the king’s court”, requests that his three friends be entrusted with the business (עֲבִידָתָא) of the government (v. 49). This verse is obviously written in view of the following narrative.

<sup>1</sup> Compare the different arrangement of the metals in chap. v. 4 and 23.

CHAPTER III.

(Verses 1—30.)

The general purpose of this Chapter is perfectly clear—from beginning to end it is a polemic against the heathen worship and in particular against idolatry. The Israelite who has to choose between idolatry and death, should unhesitatingly prefer the latter. Even when there appears no hope of deliverance, the God of Israel is able to succour those who persevere in obedience to Him.

I have already pointed out that the idea of punishment by burning was probably suggested to the author by Jer. xxix. 22. Other passages may have contributed something, particularly Is. xlivi. 2, for that sharp distinction which we are accustomed to draw between the literal and the metaphorical was not always recognized in antiquity. It has often been asked why in this chapter there is no mention of Daniel. The reason seems to be that he could not have been introduced without marring the effect. To represent him as being cast with his friends into the furnace would have involved too gross and startling an inconsistency, after the scene at the close of chap. ii. On the other hand, if Daniel had intervened to save his friends, there would have been no opportunity for the display of the divine power, preserving them unhurt amidst the flames of the furnace. On these grounds the non-mention of Daniel is perfectly natural.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Arab. al-mar'u “the man”; in the Syriac forms, emphat. māryā or mārā, constr. mārē, with suffixes mārēh, mārhōn etc., the final נ sometimes

becomes ', sometimes is treated as a mere vowel-sign, and sometimes disappears altogether.

1—6. On the form אֲקִים צָלֵם “to set up a statue, or idol”, is the usual phrase in the heathen inscriptions of Palmyra and the Haurān. The “plain” or “valley” of Dūrā has not been identified with certainty; according to Schrader there were in Babylonia several localities bearing the name of Dūru (Cuneiform Inscr. p. 430). Very important is the list of officials, in vv. 2 and 3, who are summoned by the king to the dedication of the image. It need hardly be said that in these foreign words the Masoretic vocalization is entitled to very little respect and may safely be ignored. (cf. Ezra viii. 36. Esth. iii. 12) are “satraps”, from the Old Persian khshatra-pāwan lit. “warden of the realm”. On פָּנָנִיא see chap. ii. 48. פְּחוֹתָא (Sing. פְּחוֹת Ezra v. 14, constr. פְּחוֹת) “governors”, from the Assyrian pakhatu (Schrader, Cuneiform Inscr. p. 577). The word אַדְרָנוֹיָא has often been explained as a compound of אַדְר and נָוֶר, but it is probably the Persian endarzgar “counselor”, a title which was still in use under the Sāsānians (Nöldeke, Tabarī, p. 462 note), and the resemblance with נָוָרין (chap. ii. 27) is therefore accidental. נְדָבְרִיא is commonly taken to be a variation of גְּנָבְרִיא “treasurers” (Ezra vii. 21), from the Persian ganjabara; but the analogy of v. 27 and chap. vi. 8 favours the hypothesis of Graetz and others that נְדָבְרִיא is a mere scribal error for הַדָּבְרִיא. דְּחָבְרִיא “judges” is from the Old Persian dātabara, in Pahlawī dātōbar, and in mod. Persian dawar. The meaning of תְּפָחִיא is altogether obscure; that it signifies “counsellors” and is connected with the Arabic aftā “to advise” (of which Muftī is the participle) appears very improbable, since the root in question has this meaning in Arabic only, nor would the grammatical form of the word, with prefixed n, admit of any easy explanation. Still less likely is Graetz's view that חַפְתִּיא is a mistake for הַפְתִּיא, from Greek ὑπάτοι. Possibly the word may be a mutilated form of some Persian title ending in pat "chief", cf. Pahlawi magupat "chief priest", spahpat "general", etc. On the form קָמֵן (v. 3) see ch. ii. 38. בָּרוֹעַ (v. 4) "herald", common in Syriac also, is probably not borrowed directly from the Greek αὐγροῦξ, but is formed, after the usual Aramaic fashion, from the verbal root כְּרֻוּ, which however does not appear in the Peal (see chap. v. 29). The Plural אֲמֵנָה (Syr. 'amēmē), from Sing. אֲמֵנָה, is a relic of the old plural form in which the second radical had the vowel ă (see Nöldeke, Syr. Gramm. p. 58). The Singular of אֲמֵנָה occurs in Biblical Aramaic in the stat. absol. only, אֲמֵנָה v. 29; this word is common to Hebrew, Aramaic, and Arabic, and of course originally means "the offspring of one mother", thus presupposing the so-called matriarchal condition of society. Of the six musical instruments enumerated in vv. 5, 7, 10 and 15, two, viz. קָרְנוֹא "the horn" and פִּשְׁלָקְוָתָא "the pipe", have Semitic names, and three are Greek, viz. קִתְרָס "lute", Kērī קִתְרָס (as in the Targums, e.g. Is. v. 12), Gr. κιθαρίς or κιθάρα—פְּסָנְחָרִין "harp" (for which v. 7 has פְּסָנְחָרִין), Gr. ψαλτήριον—סְוִמְפִּיָּה "bag-pipe" (omitted in v. 7: in v. 10 Kēthīb סִפְנִיה, a popular mispronunciation) Gr. συμφωνία, sec. p. 41. שְׁבָךְ, probably a kind of harp, is of doubtful origin; that it is identical with Gr. σαμβύκη cannot be questioned, but whether the Greeks borrowed the word from the Arameans, or the Arameans from the Greeks, or whether both nations borrowed it from some third language, is uncertain. That it is from the root שְׁבַךְ "to interlace" appears very improbable. The statement in Athenaeus (Bk. iv. p. 175) that the σαμβύκη was invented by the Syrians, does not of course prove the word to be Aramaic. Besides the above-named instruments there are others which the author sums up in the phrase וְכָל־זָגִיל "and all manner of music". זָגִיל, of which the Singular occurs in Syriac (emphat. zērā, constr. zan or zen) and perhaps in Hebrew (Ps. cxliv. 13), but not in Biblical Aramaic, seems to be from a Persian word zan, the etymological equivalent of Gr. γένος (see De Lagarde, Reliquiae juris ecclesiastici, graece, p. xxviii). The Persian origin of this word is admitted also by Nöldeke (Syr. Gramm. p. 83). The Masoretic vocalization of מָן (v. 6), which is the best attested reading (cf. also vv. 11, 15 and Ezra v. 3, 9), is certainly erroneous, for not only do we find mān in Syriac<sup>1</sup>, but also in the Targums with Babylonian vocalization this word has a short vowel (see p. 39). שְׁתָּהָא (for שְׁתָּהָא, Syr. shā'ēthā, cf. stat. abs. שְׁתָּהָא chap. iv. 16) means in Biblical Aramaic an indefinite space of time, as sā'a often does in Arabic; hence is derived the signification “hour”<sup>2</sup>. תנַּהֲתָא “furnace” occurs also in Syriac and Arabic; its derivation is unknown.

7—18. “when” (cf. קִדְיָה) (chaps. v. 20; vi. 11, 15) is found likewise in Palmyrene (De Vogüé, №. 15). In vv. 8—10 the denunciation of the Jews by the Chaldeans bears a great resemblance to the denunciation of Daniel by the other officials in chap. vi. 13, 14. In both cases the object of the author is the same, viz. to encourage those Jews who, for refusing to abandon their religion, were accused by their enemies of “setting the king at nought” (iii. 12; vi. 14). גָּבְרִיאָנָה (emphat. גָּבְרִיאָנָה v. 12) stands for גָּבְרִין, which is the Syriac form; the change of a to u is due to the following labial, as in the Christian Palestinian שְׁוּבָתָה (pron. shubbəthā) “Sabbath”, Syr. shabbəthā. The singular phrase שֶׁם טָעֵם “אָכְלָו קָרְצִיחָו” “they ate their pieces”, i.e. “they accused them” (cf. chap. vi. 25), is common also in Syriac; as to the precise origin of the metaphor some doubt prevails. The different use of the expression שֶׁם טָעֵם in vv. 10 and 12 is remarkable. On יְתָהָר (v. 12) see p. 38. רְנוֹן (v. 13) is vocalized according to the analogy of such forms as גְּסָפָה, although the original vowel is not ă but ū, as appears from רְנוֹנוֹ in the Targums —see also בְּתַל chap. v. 5. Instead of חְמָתָה we find also חְמָתָה (v. 19), cf. what has been said on אֲמָתָה chap. ii. 14. Very peculiar is the form הַיִתְיָה which seems to have a passive sense, “they were brought” (cf. הַיִתְיָה chap. vi. 18 and שִׁזְׁנִיא, Kerî אַשְׁר, Ezra vi. 15), whereas הַיִתְיָה (chap. v. 3) is “they brought”. It has been suggested that these passives are formed after the analogy of the passive participle שִׁמְתָּה “brought” (see the latest editions of Gesenius’ Handwörterbuch, s. v. אָתָה). If this be thought unsatisfactory, there appears no way out of the difficulty but to suppose that שִׁמְתָּה is wrongly pointed, and that for שִׁמְתָּה and שִׁמְתָּה we should read שִׁמְתַּי and שִׁמְתַּי. The meaning of (v. 14) is very obscure. It is commonly rendered, “Is it of set purpose?” the וּ being the interrogative particle, and צְדָא a noun equivalent to Hebr. צְדִיכָה (Num. xxxv. 20, 22). That צְדָא is connected with the Targumic אָצֵד “to mock” (Gesenius’ Handwörterbuch, 11th ed. s. v. צְדָא) is very unlikely, since the form would be without analogy. Possibly we should read כְּאָמֵן “is it certain?” (cf. chap. ii. 5, 8); the Peshitta has bēkushṭā “in truth”, and Theod. εἰ ἀληθῶς. In v. 15 the construction is of course elliptical, the apodosis being omitted in the first part, cf. Exod. xxxii. 32. The verb שִׁזֵּב (Syr. shauzebh) is derived from the Assyrio-Babylonian shuzub “to rescue”, the Causative of izibu “to go away” (Hebr. עֹזֶב, Arab. ‘azaba); the Syriac form seems to come nearer to the original. In v. 16 the Masoretic punctuation makes נְבוֹכְרַנְצָר to be a Vocative, but it is more natural to take it as standing in apposition to מֶלֶךְ (so Hitzig). “We have no need to answer thee a word concerning this”, i.e. concerning the question asked by Nebuchadnezzar at the end of v. 15. With the construction פְתַחֲנָם לְהַתְבִּיחַ cf. I Kings xii. 6, 9, 16. פְתַחֲנָם is found also in Ezra, Esther, Ecclesiastes and the Targums; that פְתַחֲנָם, not פְתַחֲנָם, is the correct form, appears from the Syr. pethēghāmā with aspirated g. The word is derived from the Old Persian patigāma (in mod. Persian paighām or paigham), properly, “motion towards” something, hence “message”, “word”<sup>1</sup>. Verse 17, according to the Masoretic punctuation, can mean only, “If our God, whom we serve, be able to deliver us, He will deliver (us) from the furnace of burning fire and out of thy hand, O king”, i.e. if our God be able to deliver at all, we shall be harmed neither by the fire nor by any other punishment which thou mayest inflict. Von Lengerke unnecessarily alters the punctuation, so as to make the protasis end with יְקַרְתָּךְ; he is accordingly obliged to render the וְיְמִזְרָךְ וְ by “then” (Germ. “so”). Ewald translates חִזְכֵּן “behold!”—a sense which it never bears in Biblical Aramaic. As to the vocalization of אֲלֹהָנֶם and לְשׁוֹבֵיתָנֶם, see what has been said on אֲגַתָּה chap. ii. 23. With יְכַל (where the primitive תַּ is retained) compare נְחַת chap. iv. 10, קְנַת vi. 3, קְלַת vii. 9. Verse 18, “And if not, be it known” etc., does not of course imply any real doubt as to the divine power; the idea simply is that the decision of the speakers cannot be altered, come what may. The expression “thy gods” (see also v. 12) is evidently introduced for the purpose of assimilating the situation of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego to that of the faithful Jews who refused to worship the “gods” of Antiochus.

<sup>1</sup> The Syriac mān is “what?”, contracted from mā den (Nöldeke, Syr. Gramm. p. 44).

<sup>2</sup> The word שְׁתָּהָא in post-Biblical Hebrew seems to be borrowed from the Aramaic, for otherwise it would naturally have ā in the first syllable.

<sup>1</sup> The Old Persian form is hypothetical—whether the vowel of the paenultima was long does not appear quite certain. In any case the form prati-gama, which is sometimes given, is incorrect, as the Sanscrit prati occurs nowhere in Old Persian. Paitigama (Delitzsch, Hoheslied und Koheleth, p. 340) would be Zend.

19—25. The plural form אֲשַׁתְנוּ (pron. Keri אֲשַׁתְנוּ, Singular) agrees with אֲנָפָהִי; compare the construction in II Sam. x. 9. With אֲמַת from אֲמַת (which occurs in the Targums) cf. v. 2. In the form with Suffix, מִינָה, the restoration of the primitive ' accords with Syriac usage, cf. chap. iv. 32. For a parallel to the phrase חַד שְׁבָעָה “sevenfold”, see the Peshitta, Exod. xvi. 5, סְבָעָה כַּד חַד וְלִמְלֵמָה חַלְמֵמָה “twice as much as they gather every day”. חַד “fitting”, “proper”, is common in the later Jewish Aramaic (in the Targums חַד—so also from the synonymous verb אָמַת). The late Hebrew use of רַאַי in this sense is doubtless an imitation of the Aramaic. For the transition of meaning, compare Arab. ma'rūf “known”, hence “equitable”. In v. 20 לְקַרְמָה depends upon the preceding לְכַפְתָּה. As to the passive Perfects רַקְיָה (v. 21) and רַקְיָה, see what has been said on לְיִגְבִּיתָה chap. ii. 19. In v. 21 Theod., Aquila, Symm., and the Peshitta<sup>1</sup>, render סְרָקְלָהָה by “their trousers”—with which Von Lengerke, Hitzig, and Ewald agree. De Lagarde (Gesammelte Abhandlungen, p. 206) and Fraenkel (Aramaic Lehnwörter, p. 48) derive the

<sup>1</sup> Theod. σὺν τοῖς σαραβάροις αὐτῶν—
Pesh. وَالْمَلْعُونَ; Jerome remarks, “Pro bracciis, quas Symma-chus ἀναξυπλός interpretatus est, Aquila et Theodosio saraballa dixerunt, et non, ut corrupte legitur, sarabara”.

word from Gr. σαράβαλλα (σαράβαρα), which is probably Persian (in mod. Persian shalwār), like the Syr. sharbālā and the Arab. sirwāl. Others translate “their tunics”, cf. סִרְבָּלָא “tunic” in the Talmud, Arab. sirbāl; the origin of this term is unknown—it seems to have no connection with the above-mentioned words for “trousers”, in spite of the close phonetic resemblance. פֶּתַשְׁיָהוֹן (Kērīt פֶּתַשְׁיָהוֹן with Dāghesh dirimens), in the Pēshīṭṭā תְּמֻתָּה, Theod. τιάραις, is very obscure. The later Jews and Syrians evidently had no certain tradition as to the meaning of this term, which they explained sometimes as “trousers”, sometimes as “tunic”. The latter view is adopted by Gesenius, Von Lengerke, and Hitzig, but it can scarcely be said to rest on any real evidence. Bertholdt’s identification of פֶּתַשׁ with the Greek πέτασος “broad-brimmed hat” is improbable on account of the שׁ<sup>1</sup>. That means “their mantles” may be argued from the phrase מִכְרָפֵל בְּמִשְׁלֵל פְּזַן I Chr. xv. 27, but the connection of this word with the root כְּבָל “to fasten” is very doubtful<sup>2</sup>. לְבַשְׁיָהוֹן “their garments” is added for the purpose of including all their other articles of apparel. In v. 22 the passive participle אַיִתָּה is for אַיִתָּה. On שְׁבִיבָא אֲשֶׁר see chap. ii. 15. (cf. שְׁבִיבָא שְׁבִיבָן דִּינָאוֹchap. vii. 9 and שְׁבִיב Job xviii. 5) is not necessarily akin to the Syr. shābh “to burn”, still less to the Arab. shabba (since ش corresponds etymologically to Aram. ש, ס), but seems to mean primarily a “streak” or “tongue” (cf. Syr. shēbhībhā “cord”, Arab. sabīb “wisp of hair”, and sabība “streak of blood”); hence requires to be specified by the addition of a word for “fire”. In v. 23 פֶּלְתִּיהוֹן (so Baer rightly reads, according to the Masora, not פֶּלְתִּיהוֹן) exactly corresponds to the Syr. tēlātaihōn, which appears to have been formed on <sup>1</sup> From a passage in the מדרש איכה (cited by Levy in his Neuheb. u. Chald. Wörterbuch, s.v. פֶּתַש) it might appear that in Jewish Aramaic פֶּתַש meant something worn on the feet, i.e. a kind of “shoe”. But from this passage no conclusion can be drawn, as the reading is uncertain.

<sup>2</sup> The later Jewish Aramaic כְּרַבְתָּא אֲשֶׁר “comb of a cock” probably has a different origin. But this word gave rise to the Rabbinical notion that in Daniel כְּרַבְתָּהוֹן signifies “their head-coverings”; hence the English Authorized Version renders “their hats”. It may be remembered that George Fox the Quaker deduced from this passage the celebrated doctrine that men ought not to take off their hats to royalty.

the analogy of təraiḥōn “they two”, though this would still leave unexplained the hardening of the t. In v. 24 occurs a very strange word, הַכְּבָרוֹתִי, which is peculiar to Daniel and always appears in the Plural (v. 27; iv. 33; vi. 8). In each case the context shews that it is a term referring to the personal attendants of the king, but the origin of the word is unknown. The notion, formerly held by Gesenius, that it means “leaders”, “guides”, from the Semitic root דָּבֵר, and that the initial ה is the Hebrew article, may be dismissed at once. Several attempts have been made to explain the word from the Persian, but none are satisfactory. All that can be said is that we probably have here some Persian title ending in bara (cf. נָבוֹר, דָּחֶבֶר), and that the beginning of the word may have been distorted in pronunciation<sup>1</sup>. In v. 25, as in chap. iv. 34, we should certainly expect the Pael מְהֻלְּקִין, as some MSS. actually read, instead of the Haphel מְהֻלְּקִין (cf. Kautzsch, Gramm. p. 58). The term בָּרָאֵלְהָיִן, as applied to an angel or other heavenly being, is in accordance with Gen. vi. 2. Job i. 6. It is, of course, absurd to argue that this expression implies any particular acquaintance with Babylonian mythology.

26—30. Nebuchadnezzar, on seeing the three Jews unharmed and accompanied by an angelic figure, draws near to the door of the furnace. The exact nature of the furnace here mentioned is not clear, but it would seem that there was an opening above from which the men were thrown (v. 20), and at the side a door through which they could come out. In the phrase נָאָשָׁלָת נָאָשָׁלָת (v. 27) the subst. נָאָשָׁלָת is construed as masc. (cf. נָאָשָׁלָת chap. vii. 9), whereas it is usually fem., as in Syriac<sup>2</sup>. On the other hand בָּנָת seems to agree in gender with בָּרָאֵלְהָיִן, according to the construction in v. 19, since בָּרָאֵלְהָיִן is never fem. For the judges conjointly” with somebody else, but “one who has the same judge” as somebody else, cf. in Old Persian hamapitā “born of the same father”, and the numerous modern Persian words with the prefix ham.

<sup>1</sup> That הַכְּבָרִי comes from a Persian word hamdāwar, is an unfortunate speculation of Von Bohlen, which has been adopted in the recent editions of Gesenius' Handwörterbuch. The Persian dāwar, “judge”, is a modern contraction (see vv. 2 and 3 of this chapter), and hamdāwar, if it meant anything, would mean, not “one who

<sup>2</sup> Similarly the Arab. nūr is fem. in most cases, rarely masc.

plur. גְּשִׁמְתֵּהוּ, the Kerî unnecessarily substitutes the Singular. Why the “trousers” (assuming this to be the meaning of סַרְבָּלִיהוּ) are specially mentioned, is not obvious at first, but probably this article of apparel was made, as in parts of the modern East, of some light and consequently inflammable material. לא שָׁנָא “had not changed (in colour)”, cf. chap. v. 9. The suffix in בְּחֹן presumably refers to אֲגֹדָה. In v. 29 the decree issued by the king is of a very strange character, inasmuch as he threatens “nations” with a punishment possible only in the case of individuals (cf. chap. ii. 5. Ezra vi. 11); the word בֵּיתָה, “his house”, shews that the author is here using a current phrase. שלָה is taken by the Masoretes and by most modern commentators as a scribal error for נְשָׁלָה “carelessness” (chap. vi. 5. Ezra iv. 22; vi. 9), hence “any thing amiss”. But probably Hitzig is right in reading נְשָׁלָה “word” (for נְשָׁלָה, cf. chap. iv. 14. I Sam. i. 17). With יכול (and תִּפְלֶל chap. v. 16) compare the יכול of the Targums; in the Christian Palestinian dialect also, verbs פִּי often take o in the second syllable of the Imperfect (Z. D. M. G. xxii. 500). כך “thus”, cf. Ezra v. 7; much less natural is the rendering of Von Lengerke and Hitzig “like this (God)”.

CHAPTER IV.

(III. 31—IV. 34.)

The last three verses of Chapter iii. evidently belong to what follows, and in the modern versions they accordingly are joined to Chapter iv. This piece is a narrative in the form of an epistle—purporting to be addressed by king Nebuchadnezzar to “all the peoples, nations, and languages that dwell in all the earth”. But that this epistle is really by the same author who wrote the preceding and the following chapters must be admitted by everybody, or there is an end of all argument based on internal evidence. One peculiarity which cannot fail to strike the reader, is that in the middle of the narrative (chap. iv. 25—30) the author, forgetting for the moment that he is writing in the name of Nebuchadnezzar, speaks of the king in the third person, but afterwards returns to the first (vv. 31—34).

The purpose of this piece is different from that of the preceding. It is not a warning against the Gentile religion, but a demonstration of the real helplessness of the Gentile power in the presence of the True God. To the Jewish subjects of Antiochus Epiphanes the king's power might well seem irresistible; accordingly the author here teaches, for the encouragement of his despairing brethren, that the mightiest of men has no more strength against God than the meanest, that by the divine decree a great king may in a moment be degraded not merely to the level of a beggar but to that of a brute. In order to heighten the effect of this moral lesson, Nebuchadnezzar himself, the subject of the story, is introduced as the narrator.

The question whether the narrative is based upon any historical event or tradition, has often been discussed. The Christian Fathers, who defended its truth against Porphyry, evidently knew of no external testimony that confirmed it, nor have the discoveries of modern Assyriologists thrown the smallest light upon the subject. Hengstenberg and others have appealed with great confidence to a fragment of Berossus, where it is said that Nebuchadnezzar "fell ill and died" (ἐμπεσὼν εἰς ἀρρωστίαν μετηλλάξατο τὸν βίον, see Josephus, Contra Ap. I. 20). But to argue from this that Nebuchadnezzar's illness must have been of a very extraordinary nature, is absurd, for Berossus uses almost the same words in speaking of the death of Nebuchadnezzar's father (ibid. I. 19).

Very much more worthy of notice is a fragment of the historian Abydenus, which Eusebius has preserved (Praep. Evang. IX. 41). The passage is as follows: "This also have I found concerning Nebuchadnezzar in the book of Abydenus On the Assyrians. Megasthenes relates that Nebuchadrezzar became mightier than Herakles and made war upon Libya and Iberia; having conquered these countries he transported some of their inhabitants to the eastern shore of the Sea. Afterwards, as the Chaldean story goes, when he had ascended the roof of his palace, he was inspired by some god or other, and cried aloud, ‘O men of Babylon, lo I Nebuchadrezzar announce to you the future calamity, which neither Bel my ancestor nor our queen Beltis can persuade the Fates to avert. There shall come a Persian, a mule, who shall have your own gods as his allies, and he shall make you slaves. Moreover he who shall help to bring this about shall be [the son] of a Median woman, the boast of the Assyrians<sup>1</sup>. Would that, before his countrymen perish<sup>2</sup>, some whirlpool or flood might seize him and destroy him utterly! or else would that he might betake himself to some other place, and might be driven through the desert, where is no city nor track of men, where wild beasts seek their food and birds fly hither and thither, would that among rocks and mountain clefts he might wander alone! And as for me, may I, before he imagines this, meet with some happier end!’ When he had thus prophesied, he suddenly vanished<sup>3</sup>.

Obscure as this passage is in some of its details, one fact may be regarded as certain, viz. that we have here a popular legend of Babylonian origin, coloured, of course, by the Greek medium through which it has passed. The prophecy put into the mouth of Nebuchadnezzar evidently refers to the overthrow of the Babylonian Empire by Cyrus, “the mule”. The “son of a Median woman” (assuming this to be the original reading) is the last Babylonian king, Nabūnāid, who is represented as having a share in the ruin of his country<sup>4</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Instead of οὐ δὴ συνάλτιος ἔσται Μῆδης, τὸν Ἀσσύριον αὐχῆμα Von Gutschmid proposes to read οὐ δὴ συνάλτιος νίος ἔσται Μῆδης, τὸν Ἀσσύριων αὐχῆμα.

<sup>2</sup> Instead of δοῦναι Touz proposes δῶναι.

<sup>3</sup> For a minute discussion of this passage see Prof. Schrader’s essay in the Jahrbücher für Protestantische Theologie for the year 1881.

<sup>4</sup> It would appear that the popular Babylonian legend made the last Babylonian king a son of Nebuchadnezzar, who had a Median wife (Berossus, ap. Jos. Contra Ap. i. 19). Hence arose the notion, which we find in Herodotus (Bk i. 188), that the last Babylonian king, Labynetus II. (i.e. Nabūnāid) was a son of Labynetus I. (i.e. Nebuchadnezzar). In Daniel likewise, Nebuchadnezzar’s son (Belshazzar) is the last Babylonian king. Thus Daniel agrees with the Babylonian legend and with Herodotus in a point where both are opposed to historical truth. Abydenus who relates the legend was,

The resemblances between the narrative in Daniel and the Babylonian legend in Abydenus can scarcely be accidental. But to suppose that either story has been directly borrowed from the other is impossible. It would appear that of the two stories that in Abydenus is on the whole the more primitive. Its local character is strongly marked, and it shews no signs of having been deliberately altered to serve a didactic purpose. In Daniel, on the other hand, we find a narrative which contains scarcely anything specifically Babylonian, but which is obviously intended to teach a moral lesson. It is therefore probable that some Babylonian legend on the subject of Nebuchadnezzar had, perhaps in a very distorted form, reached the ears of the author of Daniel, who modified the story in order to make it a vehicle of religious instruction. That this may have been the case will hardly be denied by any one who considers that, in the second century before Christ, many thousands of Jews were settled in Babylonia and kept up constant communication with their co-religionists in Palestine.

Chap. iii. 31—33. The Prologue of the Epistle. On the form דָּרְיוֹן see chap. ii. 38. Instead of the formula שְׁלַמְכֹון יִשְׁאָל (cf. chap. vi. 26) we find also, at the beginning of epistles, שְׁלַמְכֹון כֶּלֶב אֲמָתָן (Ezra v. 7), and in Syriac usually the simple shēlāmu. For the temporal sense of עַם in עַם שְׁמִידָר וְדָר (v. 33) cf. chap. vii. 2, the Hebrew עַם אֲמָתָן עַם לִילָּא, the Arabic ma'a d-dahr “with time”, i.e. “as long as time lasts”<sup>1</sup>.

Chap. iv. 1—6. The narrative now begins. שְׁלָמֵה “restful”, “secure”, and hence “prosperous”, is an adj. of the same form as נְגָם chap. viii. 9. רַעֲנָן, probably borrowed from the Hebrew, does not occur elsewhere in Aramaic; for the metaphor see Ps. xcii. 15. הַיּוֹבֵל is usually supposed to be identical with the Assyrio-Babylonian ikallu “palace”; in any case this word, whatever its origin, must have been very widely diffused, since it is found already in Amos viii. 3 and many centuries later was employed both in the Aramaic dialects and in Arabic. For the use of the Imperfect in v. 2, see p. 37. Instead of חַנְצָלָה (v. 3) like Berossus, perfectly aware that in reality there reigned several kings between Nebuchadnezzar and Nabūnāid, and that the former was not the father of the latter.

<sup>1</sup> See Elfachri, ed. Ahlwardt, p. 117.

we also find הַשְׁלֵל chap. v. 7. In v. 4 עֲלֵין (Keri עֲלֵין, which agrees with the Syriac form) is from a Singular אֶלָּעַ or אֶלְלָעַ (not אֶלְלָאַ as in Syriac), used in the Targums, in Christian Palestinian, and in Palmyrene (see Z. D. M. G. xxxvii. 566)—cf. also chap. v. 8. וַיֵּשׁ אֶחָרִין (v. 5) is usually taken to mean “and (so it was) till at last” etc. Gesenius believed אֶחָרִין (Keri אֶחָרָן, not אֶחָרָאַ as most editions read) to be an adj. in the Singular, used adverbially. According to Hitzig it refers to Daniel, “and (so they came) till, as last man, Daniel entered” etc.; Hävernick and Von Lengerke explain it as a plural form. But nowhere else does אֶחָרִין or אֶחָרָן mean “last” or “at last”, and it is therefore probable that we should read וַיֵּשׁ אֶחָרָן “and yet another entered” etc., as J. D. Michaelis renders. The Kethib אֶחָרִין represents another pronunciation of אֶחָרָן, the ü being weakened to e, cf. the Christian Palestinian חָרָן “another”. In שָׁם (cf. Ezra v. 1, in the Targums), the primitive t has been changed to u through the influence of the following labial; see what has been said on בְּלֹטָשָׁגָר cf. chap. i. 7. The phrase דַי רְוחָאָלָהִין קְדוּשָׁן בָּה seems to be imitated from Gen. xli. 38. אִישׁ אֲשֶׁר רְוחָאָלָהִים בָּו “The holy gods” was, in all probability, an expression commonly used by the heathens of Syria, since it occurs in Phoenician inscriptions (הַלְּנָם הַקְּדוּשָׁם, in the Inscription of Eshmun-azar). In v. 6 Daniel is described as “chief of the magicians”, referring to chap. ii. 48. אָנָּס is apparently “reduces to straits”; in Esth. i. 8 (the only other passage in the Old Testament where this verb occurs) it means “to compel”, as it does in the Talmud.

7—15. The imagery in the dream which Nebuchadnezzar now relates is obviously borrowed in great part from Ezek. xxxi. 3—14. “And as for the visions of my head upon my bed, I looked and behold” etc. The king first perceives a great tree, and afterwards, in v. 8, sees it become yet greater and stronger; for the sequence of the tenses in v. 8, cf. vv. 2, 31. חַזְקָה “the sight thereof”, is, if correctly pointed, from a form similar to Syr. s̄elōthā “prayer”, mēlōthā “blow”, but perhaps we should pronounce חַזְקָה (cf. chap. viii. 5, and Kautzsch, Gramm. p. 115). Theodotion has τὸ κύτος αὐτοῦ “its expanse”, which is probably a mere guess. In any case we have no right to assume, with Hitzig and Ewald, that חֹזֶה means “breadth”, and to connect it with the Arab. hauza or the Hebr. חַזָּה “breast”. With שְׁפִירָה (v. 9) “the foliage thereof”, cf. שְׁפָאִים (for יְשָׁפָא) Ps. civ. 12. On אֲנָכֶה for אֲנָכָה, see what has been said on אֲנָכֶה chap. ii. 9. צָוָת, like the corresponding Syr. māzōnā, has a long vowel in the first syllable. Nöldeke is inclined to regard this māt as a very ancient form of the prefix (Mand. Gramm. p. 130). In פְּטָלֵל (as contrasted with פְּדִקָּה chap. ii. 40, 44) we have one of the very rare instances, in Aramaic, of a geminate verb uncontracted in the Haphel, cf. Hebr. אָרְנוּ, תְּרִנְנֵוּ. For (i.e. יְדָרֵן) the Kərī substitutes the fem. form יְדָרֵן (cf. v. 18); in the Targums the substantive צָפֵר or צִפְּרֵר (of which the Sing. does not happen to occur in Biblical Aramaic) is, like the Hebr. בְּפָרָא, usually feminine. In v. 10 the angel who descends from heaven is described as “a watcher and a holy one”. Here for the first time in Jewish literature we find this peculiar use of שִׁיר “watcher”; in the Book of Enoch the term is extremely common, as also in the Syriac Fathers. There is no reason to suppose that in Daniel the word “watcher” refers, as it does in some patristic writings, to a particular class of angels; in Enoch it is used, sometimes at least, for angels generally (see Dillmann, Das Buch Henoch übersetzt und erklärt, pp. 104, 105). With קְדִישָׁה, as applied to an angel, cf. Hebr. קְדוֹשִׁים in Zech. xiv. 5. Ps. lxxxix. 6. Job xv. 15; the last passage clearly shews that when angels are called “holy”, this conveys no idea of moral purity or goodness, but expresses the awfulness and mysteriousness of their nature<sup>1</sup>. It is therefore quite fanciful to assume, with Von Lengerke and others, that this angel is designated as “holy” in order to distinguish him from the fallen angels; שִׁיר קְדִישָׁה is merely a collocation after the fashion of גָּר וְתַחֲבֵב Gen. xxiii. 4 etc. On the vocalization of נְחַת, see בְּלִי chap. iii. 17. To whom the angel is speaking in vv. 11 and 12 we are not told. Possibly this vagueness is intentional, indicating that the judgment upon the king is to be brought about by wholly inscrutable means. “Nevertheless leave ye the stump of its roots in the earth" (v. 12) evidently means that the punishment does not involve total destruction—a hope of restoration still remains (Job xiv. 7—9). But the following words, "and with a band of iron and brass in the grass of the field", are certainly obscure. It is very far-fetched to refer this to "the chains with which madmen are bound" (Jerome), or to "the bands of iron put round a tree to prevent it from cracking" (Von Lengerke). Hitzig and Ewald take the phrase as metaphorical, though neither makes it quite clear. Perhaps the most natural supposition is that since "iron" and "brass" are familiar types of firmness and unflinching severity (Deut. xxviii. 48. Jer. i. 18. Micah iv. 13), "the band of iron and brass" is a figure of speech for the stern and crushing sentence under which the king is to lie (see v. 14). רַקֵּעַ is, of course, for רַקְעָה, the second vowel being primitively long, as in קָרָעַ "white" (chap. vii. 9); see Kautzsch, Gramm. p. 109. The last clause of v. 12 is rendered by Von Lengerke "and with the beasts let him share the herbs of the ground"—according to which interpretation the author here drops the metaphor of a tree and speaks of Nebuchadnezzar in literal terms (cf. v. 30). That such is the case in v. 13 is obvious—"Let his heart be changed from man's"; אֲנוֹשׁ (Kerî אֲנוֹשׁ) is scarcely a Hebraism, since אֲנוֹשׁ occurs in Nabatean (Euting, Nab. Inschr. N°. 9). מִן־אֲנוֹשׁ is equivalent to מִן־לְבֵב אֲנוֹשׁ (cf. chap. i. 10), and the use of לְבֵב is like that in I Sam. xv. 23. I Kings xv. 13. Less probable is the view of Von Lengerke, who translates "away from men", i.e. the king's heart is to be changed so that he will be driven from human society (vv. 22, 30). Here the "heart" is, as usual, the intelligence. By "seven times" are meant, it would seem, seven years (see chap. vii. 25); so at least the phrase is interpreted by Josephus (Antiq. x. 10. 6), by Rashi, by Ben-Ezra, and by most modern commentators. With בְּנִזְרֶת שִׁירֵין "by the decree of the watchers" (v. 14) compare what has been said on יְמִינֵיchap. ii. 27. פְּתֻחָה אֲלָפָנָה, properly "the petition", is here a synonym of פְּתֻחָה אֲלָפָנָה, "the word", cf. Arab. hâja, properly "want", hence sometimes "affair", "business"—see also chap. iii. 29. That in this passage the "watchers" are identical with the "holy ones" is shewn by v. 10. The use of קְדִישֵׁין שִׁירֵין instead of עֲנִישֵׁין and אֲנָשִׁים קְדוּשָׁים is in imitation of the poetical style (cf. Job v. 1). But is perhaps a mistake for עַדְבָּרָה (chap. ii. 30). With בְּסִיל אֲנָשִׁים “the meanest of men”, compare שְׁפֵל אֲנָשִׁים Prov. xv. 20. אלְפִים (chap. vii. 10, Kethib), and מְלִכִּים (Ezra iv. 13) are the only examples, in Biblical Aramaic, of the plural in im; Kautzsch regards the two first as scribal errors (Gramm. p. 85). In v. 15 the Keret unnecessarily substitutes פְּשָׂרָה for פְּשָׂרָא, cf. also v. 16.

<sup>1</sup> On the phrase “a watcher and a holy one” the Christian Father Polychronius remarks, ἄγιον καλεῖ οὐον ἐξαι- πετόν τινα παρὰ πάντας τοὺς ἀνθρώπους κεκτημένον τὴν φύσιν.

16—24. On hearing the vision Daniel “was astonished as it were for a moment”. אֲנָשָׁתּוֹמָם is a hybrid form, based upon the Hebr. הַנְּשָׁתּוֹמָם (cf. chap. viii. 27), with change of the n to א after the analogy of the later Jewish Aramaic (see p. 37); here only do we find Səgōl in the prefix. Hitzig renders בֶּשְׁעָה חֲרָה “about an hour's time” (wohl eine Stunde lang). But the c does not necessarily imply that what follows is a fixed measure (cf. כְּמֻעָט גָּנוּ Is. xxvi. 20), and corresponds merely to our indefinite article (cf. אֲחֵר chap. viii. 13). In יְבָנֶךָ the suffix is added to the simple form of the Imperfect (i.e. without the usual insertion of in, as in יְשִׁיבֶנָךְ chap. vi. 17), after the fashion of the East-Aramaic dialects. It is possible that we should read יְבָנֶךָ (Jussive, as in the parallel passage, chap. v. 10), since the syntax here admits either of a singular or a plural verb. As to the form מְרִי (Keret) see what has been said on chap. ii. 47. Before interpreting the dream Daniel repeats it, with some variations. This repetition greatly increases the rhetorical effect of the announcement הוּא אֱנֹתָה “it is thou, O king” (v. 19). Instead of the Kethib רְבִיתָה (i.e. רְבִית “thou hast grown”) the Masoretes, for no apparent reason, read רְבַת, which would be 3rd pers. fem. The form רְבִיתָךְ (with Shewā in the first syllable, cf. also v. 33 and v. 18; vii. 24<sup>1</sup>) is very peculiar, for the analogy of Syriac would lead us to expect “thy greatness”, the abstract noun from רבָא, רבָ “great”. Perhaps the following verb רְבַת may have suggested to the Masoretes that the clause meant “thy growth has grown”, which would lead to the pronunciation רְבִיתָךְ, and this passage may have influenced the others. For the construction of v. 20 see chap.

<sup>1</sup> So also in the Targums with Babylonian vocalization, see Merx, Chrestom. Targ. Glossary.

ii. 41, 43. In v. 21 that which before has been termed “the decree of the watchers” (v. 14) is called “the decree of the Most High”. The Kethib מִתְהָ (Kərī מִתְהָ), instead of which most editions have מִתָּה, is either a mere blunder, as Kautzsch supposes (Gramm. p. 79), or else may have arisen out of another reading מִתִּיה (participle). Verse 23, “And that they commanded (i.e. it was commanded) to leave the stump of the roots of the tree (signifieth that) thy kingdom (shall be) secure to thee from the time when thou shalt recognize that the heavens rule”. Very remarkable is the use of שָׁמַיִם, “the heavens”, for “God”. This is without analogy in the Old Testament, but exactly agrees with the use of שָׁמַיִם in the Mishnah (cf. ὡς βασιλείᾳ τῶν οὐρανῶν in the New Testament). On the meaning of צְדֻקָּה (v. 24) see chap. ii. 6. חֲטֹאָה (Kərī חֲטֹאָה with א for the consonantal ח, as in חֲטֹאָה for עֲוֵיאָה) is probably for חֲטֹאָה, i.e. a Plural of חֲטֹאָה, Syr. ḥetāhā (so Hitzig). Kautzsch regards the word as a Singular (Gramm. p. 104). That צְדֻקָּה (stat. absol. fem., without the change of ש into צ which this root exhibits in Syriac) is not a Hebraism but genuine Aramaic, appears from the occurrence of צְדֻקָּה “the due” in the Inscription of Taimā<sup>1</sup>. This proves also that long before the book of Daniel was written the word had acquired the special sense of a “payment for religious purposes”, so that Theodotion is possibly right in rendering בְּצְדֻקָּה ἐν ἔλεημοσύναις “by alms-giving”; צְדֻקָּה often has this meaning in the Talmud, and quite similar is the Syr. zedhkēthā. Von Lengerke, Ewald and others, prefer to translate “by righteousness”. רָמָא (Theod. λύτρωσα, Vulg. redime) is rendered “redeem” by Hitzig and Ewald. But though רָמָא, both in Hebrew (Ps. cxxxvi. 24) and Syriac, may mean to “redeem” persons, it never signifies to “expiate” offences, for רָמָא, which the Peshitta here employs, proves nothing as to native Syriac usage. More probably we should translate, with Von Lengerke, “break off,” “cast away”; the metaphor is taken from the breaking of a yoke (cf. וְקַרְקַע עַל־מַעַל צְנַעַךְ Gen. xxvii. 40, as also in the Mishnah כָּל הַפּוֹרֵק מִמֶּנוּ עַל תּוֹרָה “every man who casts off the yoke of the Law”, Abōth III. 9). צְנַעַךְ (in the less correct editions שְׁנִיתָה (see the Targum, Ps. li. 4, 7); to derive it from a Singular עֲנֵי (Kautzsch, Gramm. p. 102) is contrary to analogy, since the Plural would then be עֲנֹתָה. With עֲנֵי cf. בְּמַתָּן עֲנֵי (Kərī, p. 21) Prov. xiv. 21. עֲנֵי (not עֲנֵין, as most editions have) is for עֲנֵין, from עֵין which may have been formed, after a false analogy, in imitation of Hebr. עֵין. “If haply there may be a lengthening of thy prosperity”—for הִנֵּה in this sense cf. Ezra v. 17; Von Lengerke points out the similarity of this clause to Acts viii. 22, “repent.....if haply (εἰ ἀπά) the thought of thy heart may be forgiven thee”. Hitzig renders, “If thy prosperity is to be lasting”, taking הִנֵּה as simply conditional. אֲרָקָה (pointed as if from a primitive form arakat) has the same meaning here as in chap. vii. 12 (cf. Ezek. xii. 22), and שְׁלֹחָה seems to be an abstract noun corresponding to the adj. שְׁלָה in v. 1. The Peshittā renders this clause “until He removes thy sins far from thee”, pronouncing שְׁלֹוחָ or שְׁלֹוחָה instead of שְׁלֹחָה. So also Ewald interprets, and, substituting אֲרָקָה “healing” (Is. lvii. 8) for אֲרָקָה, he translates “If haply thy folly may be healed”.

<sup>1</sup> See Noldeke's article, “Altaramäische Inschriften aus Teimā,” in the Sitzungsberichte der königl. preuss. Akademie der Wissenschaften, 1884.

25—34. In נִכְּנָה, “all this”, the emphatic termination has the force of a demonstrative. על גִּימֶל מִלְכֹוֹתָא דֵי בְּבָל (v. 26) “on (the roof of) the royal palace at Babylon”, cf. II Sam. xi. 2. In v. 27 בְּנִיתָה is far better attested than בְּנִיתָה, but is altogether anomalous. In the Old Testament “to build a city” often means nothing more than to fortify it or erect buildings within it (II Chron. xi. 5, 6). לְבִית מֶלֶכִי “for a royal residence”, cf. בֵּית מֶלֶכָה Amos vii. 13. Instead of בְּחִקָּה we should rather expect בְּתִקָּה (as some editions read, though on insufficient authority), or else בְּתִקָּה, after the analogy of בְּתִלְלָה, בְּנִי. Perhaps the vocalization בְּחִקָּה may have arisen from an attempt to assimilate this word to the following לְקָרָה. In v. 30 the effect of the sentence upon Nebuchadnezzar is described—since “the heart of a brute” (v. 13) has been given him, he becomes gradually changed in outward appearance. The last part of the verse is of course elliptical—“like (the feathers of) eagles, like (the claws of) birds”, cf. מִן־אָנוֹשָׁה in v. 13. The comparing of hair to plumage is not unnatural, as Meinhold supposes, nor is there any reason to doubt the accuracy of the text;

the special mention of “eagles” is due to the length of their feathers (Ezek. xvii. 3). The Aramaic טְפִירָה (Syr. tephru), like its Arabic equivalent طَفْرٌ, applies equally to the nails of human beings, the claws of birds, and the hoofs of quadrupeds (cf. chap. vii. 19). In v. 31 “the days” are the seven years before mentioned (vv. 13, 22, 29). That Nebuchadnezzar recovers his reason on looking heavenwards offers a curious parallel with Euripides, Bacchae 1265 ff., where the same thing happens to the frenzied Agauē. The resemblance is the more remarkable because the Bacchants, like Nebuchadnezzar, are in some sort assimilated to animals—they not only wear the skins of beasts but also suckle young fawns and wolves (Bacchae, 699). Both in Daniel and in Euripides the looking heavenwards indicates a return to humanity. This conception is perhaps based upon some popular superstition. With תֵּין עַל מֶמֶּה cf.chap. xii. 7. The latter part of v. 31 and the whole of v. 32 form a parenthesis; in v. 33 the author takes up the narrative again by repeating the statement in v. 31 that Nebuchadnezzar recovered his reason, and the effects of the change are then described. It is quite unnecessary to suppose, with Hitzig, that v. 31 and v. 33 refer to separate events. Verse 32 is in part suggested by Is. xl. 17. בְּלָה חֲשִׁיבָן is usually rendered “are counted as nought” (Theod. ὡς οὐδὲν ἐλογίσθησαν—so also the Peshittā). According to this interpretation נַחַת (elsewhere written נַחַת) is here used as a substantive, “nothingness”. But for this there is no analogy either in Aramaic or Hebrew, for from Job vi. 21 no safe conclusion can be drawn. The Talmud, Yōmā 20<sup>b</sup>, explains that לֹה here means חֲרֵגָה “mote”—which is, of course, a mere fancy. Perhaps we should take לֹה חֲשִׁיבָן as a single conception, “persons of no account”, cf. in Hebrew לֹא כְּלָמָד “that which is not bread”, Is. lv. 2, and the Targum, Is. liii. 3, בְּסִירָן שְׂמִינִי “despised and not respected”. נַחַת חַיל שְׁמִינִי “the host of heaven”, is a phrase used both of the angels and of the stars, for the latter, as is well known, were often regarded as living beings<sup>1</sup>. “There is none who can reprove Him, and say to Him,

<sup>1</sup> Such passages as Is. xl. 26 and Job xxxviii. 7 admit of being taken as mere poetical metaphors, but more than this must be meant in the Book

What hast Thou done?" cf. Job ix. 12. Eccles. viii. 4. The phrase "to strike on the hand", i.e. to reprove, interfere with, is found in the Hebrew of the Mishnah (Pĕsâhîm IV. 8, מיהו בידם "they reproved them") and elsewhere in later Jewish literature. In v. 33 the words וְלֹא־קָרַב מֶלֶכְתִּי הָרִי וּזְיוּן חִזְבֵּן עַלְיָה are omitted in the Pĕshîttâ—but this is a mere blunder, due to the homoio-teleuton it (i.e. פָּנָישׁ "my reason") returned to me". Hitzig and others take ל as introducing the subject of the clause, "and also the glory of my kingdom, my majesty and my splendour returned to me"—but the passages cited by Hitzig in support of this are not conclusive. Rosenmüller takes הָרִי וּזְיוּן alone as the subject, "And to the glory of my kingdom my majesty and my splendour returned to me", and explains לְקָרַב מֶלֶכְתִּי as meaning "ut gubernatio mea et regni administratio debito gauderet aestimatio civibusque proficua esset". Instead of יָבֻעַן (so Baer, in most editions יָבֻעַן) we should expect יָבֻעַן, since the Pael of this verb is not employed elsewhere. For קָתַקְתָּה "I was established" most MSS. have קָתַקְתָּה which, if intended for the 1st pers., is quite anomalous. On the use of the Hophal in Biblical Aramaic, see p. 37, and compare, besides חִזְפֵּת in this verse, chaps. v. 13, 15, 20; vi. 24; vii. 4, 11. The verb חִזְקָה "to be straight" occurs in Biblical Hebrew in the Kal and Piel only (Eccles. i. 15; vii. 13; xii. 9), but in the Targums, as in Syriac, the Aphel אֲתַקְתָּה is found<sup>1</sup>. In v. 34, מְרוּמָם is, of course, borrowed from the Hebrew; the verb רְמוּמָה "to exalt" occurs again in the Targums and in Christian Palestinian, which shews that it had really passed into common use. On מהלכין see chap. iii. 25. In this last verse the author sums up the teaching which the chapter is intended to convey.

of Enoch (xviii. 14—16), where we read of a prison "for the stars of heaven and the host of heaven". These stars, we are told, are fallen angels. See also Rev. ix. 1.

nection with the Arabic yakīna "to be sure", since this latter is derived, through the Aramaic, from Gr. εἰκὼν; see Fraenkel, Aramäische Fremdwörter, p. 273.

<sup>1</sup> The root קָתַק probably has no con-

CHAPTER V.

(V. 1—VI. 1.)

The Fifth Chapter of Daniel relates events which are said to have taken place at the end of the reign of the Chaldean king Belshazzar (v. 30), son of Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 2, 11, 13, 18, 22). The question whether king Belshazzar ever existed, has already been discussed (p. 18). We have seen that Nabū-nāid, the last Babylonian king, really had a son named Bil-shar-usur. As to the end of this prince nothing is known, for Prof. Schrader's suggestion that he may have been slain in battle at the time of the fall of Babylon (Cuneif. Inscr. p. 435), seems to be a mere hypothesis. That the name Belshazzar is of Babylonian origin cannot be doubted, but what legends connected with the name may have reached the author of Daniel, it is impossible to say.

The general teaching of this chapter has considerable affinity with that of the preceding one. In both we see the representative of the heathen power exalting himself in utter forgetfulness of the True God, and smitten forthwith by a sudden and mysterious judgment. But in this chapter the author makes far more obvious allusions to the circumstances of his own time than in chap. iv. The offence of Nebuchadnezzar is simply pride, whereas Belshazzar commits the more heinous crime of profaning the vessels taken from the Temple at Jerusalem and of bestowing upon idols the worship due to the True God only (v. 23). So far Belshazzar answers exactly to Antiochus Epiphanes. But here, as elsewhere, the author of Daniel introduces into the narrative elements which are purely ideal. Thus the honour which Belshazzar pays to Daniel cannot have been suggested by anything in the conduct of Antiochus, but serves to shew how the Gentile power must in the end be brought to reverence the representatives of the God of Israel.

1—5. בְּלֶאשָׁזָר, less correctly (v. 30; vii. 1; viii. 1), is, as we have seen, a corruption of Bil-shar-uṣur, i.e. “Bel, preserve thou the king!” With עָבֹד לְחַתֵּם “he made a feast” cf. the corresponding Hebrew phrase חַתֵּם עַשְׂרֵים Eccles. x. 19. The words “and in the presence of the thousand he was drinking wine” are added for a special reason, since in the ancient East kings usually feasted in an apartment by themselves or with a few persons only (Athenaeus, Bk iv. p. 145). בְּשִׁטְעָם חַמְרָא (v. 2) “as they tasted the wine”, i.e. in the midst of the revel; here only in Biblical Aramaic is שִׁטְעָם used in its literal sense—the Hebr. שְׁטָעָם also may be either literal (Num. xi. 8) or metaphorical (Prov. xi. 22). The mention of the vessels which Nebuchadnezzar brought from the Temple at Jerusalem evidently refers back to chap. i. 2, מְאֻנִיא being exactly equivalent in meaning to the Hebr. מְלִים. מְאֹן (which happens not to occur in the Singular in Bibl. Aram.) can, of course, have no connection with מַ “what?” (as is suggested in the 11th ed. of Gesenius’ Handwörterbuch, s.v. מְאֹן), but is a noun with prefixed מ, akin to the Hebr. אֲנָה “ship” and the Arabic īnā “vessel” (see Nöldeke, Mand. Gramm. p. 129). וַיַּיְשְׁתַּחַן “that they might drink”, cf. וַיַּדְעַ “that I may know”, chap. ii. 9. The women who attend the feast are distinguished as the “wives” and the “concubines” of the king. The term מֶלֶךְ was applied by the Jews, and perhaps by the Arameans also, to the wife of the Persian king (Neh. ii. 6). Whether the title was restricted to one wife we cannot say—among the old Hebrews a royal court might include many מֶלֶכֶת (Cant. vi. 8, 9), so that there is nothing surprising in the use of the plural מֶלֶכֶת. The word לְחַנְתִּי “concubine”, which the Targums employ both in the Sing. and the Pl., is peculiar to West-Aramaic, the corresponding Syriac term being dērūkhtā. The primary meaning of לְחַנְתִּי is unknown; Fleischer supposes it to have been originally a term of abuse, akin to Arab. lakhnā'u. With נְפָקֵה (Kērī נְפָקֵה), in v. 5, comparechap. vii. 8 and נְפָלוּ id. 20. In all these cases the Kēthib is probably the original reading, and the Kērī a correction for the purpose of making the verb agree with the feminine subject (see Kautzsch, Gramm. p. 46). The use of נְפָקֵה etc. for both genders alike is not necessarily a Hebraism but may be due merely to grammatical laxity, for the same phenomenon appears in Nabatean (Euting, Nab. Inschr. № 3, 8) and modern Arabic<sup>1</sup>. Arabic נְבָרְשָׁתָא “lamp”, in Syriac nabhreshṭā, is a foreign word of unknown origin. נִירָא “chalk” (cf. נָר Is. xxvii. 9) is not found in Syriac, but is common in later Jewish Aramaic and appears also in Arabic. With בְּתַל (Pl. emphat. Ezra v. 8) cf. רִנֵּי chap. iii. 13. “And the king saw the hollow of the hand which wrote”—we must suppose the hand to have appeared above the place where the king was reclining. פֶּם (stat. emphat. אֲפָם v. 24) answers to the Rabbinical Hebrew פֶּם, sometimes in the fem. form פֶּמֶת, and to the Syriac passēthā, which, like Hebr. פֶּמֶת, may mean both the “palm” of the hand and the “sole” of the foot<sup>2</sup>.

6—12. On יָזַח see chap. ii. 31. On שְׁנָוָהִי is usually explained as meaning “was changed for him”, but this use of the suffix is very doubtful. We should probably read either שְׁנָיו עַלְוָהִי (acc. to v. 9), as Kautzsch proposes (Gramm. p. 156), or else simply שְׁנוֹ. קְטָרִי תְּרִצָּה “the joints (lit. fastenings) of his loins”; for the phrase, cf. Ps. lxix. 24. חַרְצָא, prop. “the lower part of the back”, is the common form in later Jewish Aramaic; in Syriac we find hassū, with assimilation, but in Mandaite הַאֲלַצָּא (pron. halsū), agreeing with Hebr. חַלְצִים. The Arab. khasr sides with Jewish Aramaic in having r, but transposes the last two consonants; whether the primitive Semitic form had r or l is which is of course identical with Syr. parsēthā and Hebr. פֶּרֶקָה “hoof”. [In II Kings ix. 35 the Targum, as edited by De Lagarde, has פִּרְסָתִ יְדֵיָא, but the Bomberg editions read פִּסְתָּה יְדֵיה]. Since the existence of a root פְּסָס is very doubtful, the idea naturally suggests itself that פֶּם may have been formed from פְּרָסָם, with assimilation of the ר; but the objection to this hypothesis is that the forms with ר still continued to be used, though with a difference of meaning. The Phoenician פְּסָס “tablet” is probably metaphorical, from the resemblance of the object to the “flat” of the hand.

<sup>1</sup> The old fem. plur. of the Perfect, with the ending ā, is common in the Targums; in Christian Palestinian the ā seems to have been weakened to ē (e.g. אָזְלִי “they went”, אָכְלִי “they bought”, אָשְׁבָחִי “they found”, in the Lectionary, p. 33). This final ‘ is not to be confounded with the final ־ which appears in the corresponding Syriac forms, according to the so-called Western orthography, since in the latter case, the ־ is a mere conventional sign introduced by scribes in order to distinguish the fem. pl. from the maso. sing.

<sup>2</sup> The Targums use פֶּמֶת for “palm”, but for “sole” פְּרַסְתָּא,

therefore uncertain. Instead of מִשְׁפָּעַ (Hithpaal) we should expect rather מִשְׁפָּאֵן (Hithpeel), since in Bibl. Aram., as in Syriac, the Pael אָשָׁר (Ezra v. 2) means “to begin”, not “to loosen”—for from מִשְׁרָאֵן (v. 12) no conclusion can be drawn. The Targum however uses משְׁרֵי (which, if the text be correct, must be a participle Pael) for “looseneth”, in Job xii. 18. אָרְקָבָתָה (so Baer, in accordance with the best MSS.) “his knees”, is a form with prosthetic נ, and occurs also in the Targums (Eccles. xii. 3), side by side with the more primitive רְכִיבָּא, רְכִיבָּתָא (cf. Arab. rukba). The doubling of the ב in the Biblical form is probably a late change (Kautzsch, Gramm. p. 31). The promise made by Belshazzar in v. 7 seems to be in part suggested by Gen. xli. 42, where Pharaoh arrays Joseph in fine linen and places a chain of gold about his neck. הַלְּחָדָה stands for ha“alā (or, with dissimilation, הַנְּשָׁלָה chap. iv. 3), according to the rule in Hebrew that when a guttural has קָמֵשׁ, a Pathaḥ immediately preceding becomes Səgōl or Kames. אֲרָגָנוֹן, “purple”, is here spelt with נ, as in the other Aramaic dialects; from the Aramaic is derived the Arabic urjuwan and probably also the Persian arghawan. The Assyrian form is given as argamannu (Schrader, Cuneif. Inscr. p. 155), but whether it was really pronounced with m, like the Hebr. אֲרָגָם, or with w, is uncertain, since m and w are not distinguished in the cuneiform character. אֲרָגָם and אֲרָגָנוֹן are commonly supposed to be of Indian origin; to this, however, there are two objections, firstly that the red purple dye was produced, not in India, but on the Mediterranean coasts, secondly that אֲרָגָם occurs already in Judges viii. 26. הַמְּנִיכָא (the forms הַמְּנִיכָה, המְנִיכָה are erroneous), “necklace”, appears in later Jewish Aramaic as מְנִיכָא, in Syriac as hamnîkhâ or hemnîkhâ, and in Greek as μανιάκης. That the word is originally neither Aramaic nor Greek appears certain. Possibly it may be from the Persian himyān, “girdle” (which has passed both into Syriac and Arabic) with the diminutive ending ak; this hypothesis would account for the Kethib הַמְּנִיכָה, but the change of meaning involves some difficulty. פְּלָטִי (in vv. 16, 29, פְּלָטִים) is ordinarily translated “third” (Theod. τρίτος), i.e. “as third ruler”. In this case, however, the grammatical form remains wholly inexplicable, for the ordinal is תְּלִיתִי (chap. ii. 39), never תְּלִיטִי. Gese-nius regarded תְּלִקְתָּא as stat. emphat. of a form תְּלִתָּה “third rank”, while Kautzsch takes it to be an “abnormal” stat. emphat. of תְּלִיטִי (Gramm. p. 121). Such a form as תְּלִתָּה תְּלִקְתָּא, תְּלִיטִי, “third rank”, is not only unknown in Aramaic but is wholly unsupported by the analogy of the other Semitic dialects—not to mention the difficulty of supposing that in v. 16 תְּלִקְתָּא is equivalent to שְׁלֵטָה in v. 29. Still more improbable is the explanation of Kautzsch, for it involves two irregularities, the use of תְּלִיטִי instead of תְּלִיתִי, and the disappearance of the long ī in the emphatic state. The LXX., the Pĕshittā, and Josephus (Antiq. x. 11. 2) translate “a third part”, which in the Targums is תְּלִיקְתָּא. This interpretation might perhaps suit v. 29, but in vv. 7 and 16 it is inadmissible, since the verb שָׁלַט never governs a direct object. That תְּלִקְתָּא and תְּלִיטִי are mere mistakes for תְּלִיתִי is scarcely probable, for why should so well-known a word as the latter have been thus strangely distorted, and that three times over in the same chapter? In view of these difficulties I would suggest, as a possible solution, that תְּלִקְתָּא may be the Aramaic equivalent of the Arabic ath-thilth (with which it almost exactly agrees in form) “every third day”, i.e. “every other day” (cf. Amos iv. 4). In this case in v. 7 would be a mistake due to a scribe who, not understanding תְּלִתָּה, read the word as תְּלִקְתָּא “third”. The proclamation that the interpreter of the writing on the wall should reign over the kingdom on alternate days with the king himself, may seem extravagant, but it is certainly less extravagant than the decree of Darius in chap. vi. 8—10. On עֲלֵיכֶם, in v. 8, see chap. iv. 4. It is somewhat strange that v. 8 should describe the wise men as “entering”, since in the latter half of v. 7 they are already present. Whether their inability to read the inscription was due to its being written in a strange character or, as the medieval Rabbins imagined, to some peculiar arrangement of the letters, we are not told. מִשְׁפְּגָנִים (v. 9) is not merely “were perplexed”, but “were thrown into confusion” (Hitzig). The queen who appears in v. 10 is regarded by almost all modern commentators as the mother of Belshazzar, not as his wife. This view is based partly on the fact that she is distinguished from the king's wives (v. 3), partly on the manner in which she speaks of what had taken place in the days of Nebuchadnezzar (v. 11). Many writers have maintained that the queen here mentioned is a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, but there is nothing in the text to favour this assumption, and the phrase "thy father" which she uses in addressing her son (v. 11) certainly appears to indicate that she is speaking rather of her husband than of her father. לְקַבֵּל מִלְּפָא is rendered either "because of that which had happened to the king" (Bertholdt, Von Lengerke), according to the use of מִלְּתָה in chap. ii. 23, or else "because of the words of the king" (Hitzig, Ewald), which agrees better with the context. The Kethib עַלְלָתָה (i.e. עַלְלָת, Keri שְׁלָע, according to the later usage) is analogous to עַלְלִין in v. 8. Instead of the forms יְבַחֲלִיק and יְשַׁחַנְוּ<sup>1</sup>, we might have expected יְבַחֲלִיךְ and יְשַׁחַנוּ, but the accuracy of the Masoretic text is here confirmed by the Aramaic inscription of Taimā, in which we find "may they expel him!" Hence it follows that יְבַחֲלִיךְ and יְשַׁחַנוּ are relics of the old Jussive form of the Imperfect—a form which in classical Arabic is clearly distinguished from the ordinary Imperfect (the so-called Indicative). Verse 12, as it stands in the Masoretic text, is quite contrary to syntax, for to take שְׁבָלְתָּנוּ as a stat. constr., with Rosenmüller and Von Lengerke, is manifestly inadmissible. Accordingly there is little doubt that we should read מִשְׁרָא for מִפְשָׁר and מִשְׁרָא for מִפְשָׁר, according to the Vulgate and most recent interpreters (see Kautzsch, Gramm. p. 65, note)—i.e. "Because an excellent spirit and knowledge and understanding, the interpreting of dreams and the explaining of riddles and the loosing of spells (lit. knots), were found in Daniel, whose name the king changed to Belteshazzar—now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation". אֶתְנָיו is stat. constr. of the Infinitive of הַנְּקַחַת (= אֶתְנָה), cf. Ezra iv. 22. אֶתְנָה אֶתְנִיקָה would be the exact equivalent of the Hebr. חִנָּה (cf. Judg. xiv. 12—14). אֶתְנִיקָה, Syr. uhdəthū or uhadhəthū, is properly "a thing closed in, concealed", from the verb אֶתְנָה (Hebr. אֶתְנָה). De Lagarde very plausibly suggests that the

<sup>1</sup> The only other cases of the absence of the final n in the 3rd pers. pl. of the

Imperfect are the doubtful forms יְחִיטָה<sup>2</sup> and יְאָבָדָה<sup>3</sup>. Ezra iv. 12 and Jer. x. 11.

Hebr. חִידָה is borrowed from the Aramaic (Anmerkungen zur griechischen Uebersetzung der Proverbien, p. 73), in which case the verb חִיד (Judg. xiv. 12) would be merely a denominative. קְנַתְרֵי, “knots”, is usually explained to mean “difficult questions”, but it is much more probable that there is here a reference to the well-known superstitions about magic knots which it required special skill to untie<sup>1</sup>. The verb הַשְׁאַכְתָּה agrees in gender and number with שְׁקַלְתָּנוּ (cf. v. 14), the intervening words being an explanatory parenthesis.

13—vi. 1. Daniel, on entering, appears to be personally unknown to Belshazzar, although, according to chap. viii. 27, he had been employed in the king’s service. In v. 15 the words וְפִשְׁרָה לְהֹעֲשָׂתִי are, of course, a continuation of the preceding clause, לְהֹעֲשָׂתִי being equivalent to וְהֹעֲשָׂנִי. On the form תָּכַל (Keri לָכַל), in v. 16, see chaps. ii. 10; iii. 29. The general term פְּנַירִין is here substituted for the more special חֶלְמִין in the parallel passage, v. 12. Instead of נִזְבְּחַךְ (so Baer), in v. 17, some editions have נִזְבְּחָךְ; the formation of the Plural, with an additional ‘, is anomalous—on see chap. ii. 6. In v. 18, אַנְתָּה is a Nominativus pendens, and is taken up by the suffix in אַנְכָּךְ (cf. the somewhat less bold construction in chap. ii. 29); the general sense therefore is “Thou, O king, art the son of that Nebuchadnezzar to whom” etc. For מַחְטָּה (v. 19), partic. Haphel of חַטָּה, some MSS. and editions wrongly read מַחְטָּה “striking” (Theod. ἔτυπτεν). In v. 20, רַם can hardly be taken as a passive partic., but is rather a Perfect with intransitive vocalization, exactly similar to Syr. mīth (Hebr. מְתָה). פְּרִסָּה, stat. constr. of אַנְכָּךְ (see chap. vii. 9), is from an older form kursai (cf. Syr. kursēyā, stat. constr. kursai). It is commonly supposed that here the ר is inserted to compensate for the loss of the doubling which appears in Hebr. אַנְכָּה, Assyr. kussūl; but hiding it in a well. The prophet, at the suggestion of the angel Gabriel, sent for the cord and recited over it verses of the Koran; at each verse a knot came undone, whereupon the spell was dissolved (Al-Baidāwī on the Koran, cxiii. 4).

<sup>1</sup> Among the Syrians the kātrai kētrē, “tiers of knots”, were a species of enchanters (see Sancti Ephraem Syri Hymni et Sermones, ed. Lamy, II. p. 419, and Kayser, Die Canones Jacob’s von Edessa, p. 130). It is related that a Jew cast a spell upon Mohammed by tying knots in a cord and

possibly the form with ר may be the more primitive, since in Phoenician also we find כְּרָסִים “thrones” (where the ר is necessarily consonantal, as in the Aramaic forms)—the Arab. kursî, “chair”, of course proves nothing either way, since it is borrowed from the Aramaic. This word can scarcely be connected with כְּסָה “to cover”, or with בְּקָסָה “full moon”, but is very probably of non-Semitic origin<sup>1</sup>. Instead of וַיָּקֹרֶה we should perhaps read וַיָּקֹרֶה (according to the P̄eshittā) with Rosenmüller and Hitzig. With הַעֲדֵיו, for הַעֲדֵי cf.chap. vii. 22. In v. 21 we find בְּנֵי אֱנֹשׁ substituted for the simple אֱנֹשׁ of chap. iv. 22, 29, 30. The Kethib שָׂוִי can be explained only as another form of אִשְׁר “it was equal”, a verb common in the Targums and in Syriac (cf. Syr. ܐܻܻܳ or ܻܻܳ “to rejoice”, ܻܻܳ or ܻܻܳ “to be intoxicated”), but the Keri שָׂיוֹי “they placed” is preferable, the omission of the ו being due to the ו following; the Syr. sh̄ewe “equal” would of course be שָׂוָה or שָׂיא in Bibl. Aramaic, not שָׂיוֹ. Accordingly לְבָבָה עַמְ-חִוּתָה שָׂיוֹ is “and his heart (i.e. mind) they placed (on a level) with (the heart of) the wild beasts”. The ellipse עַמְ-לְבָבָ חִוּתָה, for עַמְ-לְבָבָ חִוּתָה is exactly similar to that in chap. iv. 13. “The wild asses”, שָׂרְדִּין, are here mentioned as a type of savagery (cf. Job xxxix. 5—8). On מְרֹצֶם (v. 22) see chap. ii. 8, and on the Hebrew form מְרֹצֶם (v. 23) see chap. iv. 34. With אַרְכָּתָךְ “thy ways”, i.e. “thy destinies” cf. Jer. x. 23. In v. 25 the inscription on the wall is read, in vv. 26—28 it is explained, but the divergence between the reading and the explanation has always perplexed commentators<sup>2</sup>. In v. 25 Daniel reads תְּקִלָּתָן חַקְלָתָן מְנָא וּפְרָסִין ; in the explanation no account is taken of the repetition of מְנָא, and פְּרָסִים is substituted for פְּרָסִין. If the vocalization be correct, תְּקִלָּתָן and פְּרָסִים cannot signify “weighed” and “divided”, as the interpretation in vv. 27, 28 seems to require; the form וּפְרָסִין

<sup>1</sup> That the Hebr. נְכָסָה may be from בְּרָסָה is the view of Olshausen (Lehrbuch der hebr. Sprache, p. 347). The form of אֱנֹשׁ would in itself suggest a foreign origin, since this nominal form is found only in adjectives (חריש, עָגָר etc.) and in a few abstract verbal nouns

(e.g. צָלִין Lev. xiv. 43, שְׁלִימָם Deut. xxxii. 35). According to Schrader (Cuneiform Inscr. p. 383) the word is Akkadian.

<sup>2</sup> The ancient Versions, with the exception of the P̄eshittā, avoid the difficulty by altering the text of v. 25.

likewise has no apparent sense. We may therefore assume that the phrase מנא מנא תקל ופרטין was not arbitrarily invented by the author, but was borrowed from some other source, the interpretation in vv. 26—28 being an attempt to extract from the words, in spite of grammar, a meaning suitable to the occasion. An examination of the passage was published in the Journal Asiatique for 1886 by M. Clermont-Ganneau, who points out that the mysterious inscription consists in reality of names of weights (see also Nöldeke in the Zeitschrift für Assyriologie, Vol. I. pp. 414—418). קָגָא (stat. absol.) is the exact Aramaic equivalent of the Hebr. מִנָה (Ezck. xlvi. 12; Ezra ii. 69 and in the Mishnah), which the Greeks, borrowing from the Phoenicians, made into μνᾶ, Lat. mina. In Syriac the word seems not to occur in the stat. absol. of the Singular; the stat. emphat. is manyā. תְקֵלַת is stat. absol. of חִיקָלָת (Targum Onk., Exod. xxxviii. 26), Hebr. שְׁקֵלָן. פֶרְסִין might be taken as a plural of פֶרְסָם in v. 28 (according to the analogy of לְחֵם stat. emphat. לְחָמָן), but whether the vocalization is here correct may be doubted. In the Mishnah and other Jewish writings the half-mina is called פֶרְסָם (lit. “division” of the mina), and an Assyrian weight in the British Museum bears the inscription (in the Aramaic character), which Nöldeke explains as being probably equivalent to פֶרְסָם, since the Assyrians appear to have interchanged שׁ and ס in pronunciation. In Daniel therefore we must either regard פֶרְסִין and פֶרְסָם as mistakes for פֶרְסָם and פֶרְסִין, or else suppose that the forms פֶרְסָם and פֶרְסִין were synonymous. Thus the inscription is—A MINA, A MINA, A SHEKEL, AND HALF-MINAS. Why these words are here introduced, whether they have any special reference to the situation of Belshazzar or to the times of the author of Daniel, remains altogether obscure. Verses 26—28 are plays upon the words of the inscription; in v. 28 the play is a double one. “MINA—God hath NUMBERED thy kingdom and finished it. SHEKEL—thou hast been WEIGHED in the balance and hast been found wanting. HALF-MINA—thy kingdom hath been DIVIDED and given to the Medes and PERSIANS”. Instead of the מְנָנִי (v. 27) of the ordinary editions, Norzi and Baer have the doubtful singular form מְנָנִיא. Kautzsch suggests that this form may be due to the pedantry of the scribes, who reflected that the object weighed must be in one scale of the balance (Gramm. p. 85). (v. 29) “and they proclaimed concerning him .....”. הָכְרִזּוּ, Syr. akhrez, is probably taken from some form of the Greek επηρύσσειν, cf. נָגֵן “herald” chap. iii. 4<sup>1</sup>. The story closes with the summary mention of the murder of Belshazzar—by whom he was slain we are not told—and of the accession of Darius the Mede. That chap. vi. 1 properly belongs to what precedes and refers to what took place immediately upon Belshazzar’s death, is obvious. As to Darius the Mede, and as to the meaning of the phrase “he received the kingdom”, see p. 20 and the introduction to the next chapter. The statement that Darius was about 62 years old when he came to the throne, is probably based upon some chronological calculation of the author, but what data he had before him we have no means of knowing.

CHAPTER VI.

(Verses 2—29.)

This chapter, which closes the first half of the book, is occupied with the history of Daniel during the reign of Darius the Mede, and describes in particular how Daniel, in consequence of his strict adherence to the usages of the Jewish religion, was sentenced to death, but miraculously delivered. The general

<sup>1</sup> Kautzsch supposes (Gramm. pp. 58, 119) that from επηρύσσειν the Aramaic means coined a verb נָגֵן, whence נָגֵן would be regularly derived, and that the Haphel נָגַרְתִּי is merely a denominative from נָגֵן. But of the existence of a Peal נָגַן there is no proof—for in the Peshitta Acts xv. 36 the true reading is נָגַן—and that נָגֵן may be formed from aim of the chapter is therefore much the same as that of chapter iii., and in a few places the verbal resemblance between the two narratives must strike every reader (iii. 12; vi. 14—iii. 25; vi. 24—iii. 28; vi. 23). The main difference is that chapter iii. insists upon the negative duty of abstention from idolatry, while chapter vi. dwells upon the positive side of Judaism. This difference naturally affects the form of both stories. Since the author purposes, in chapter vi., to represent an Israelite condemned to death for refusing to abandon the practices of his religion, and since during the Exile the religion of Israel consisted merely in acts of private devotion, it was necessary that Daniel should be placed in a situation which made even the private worship of God a capital offence. The task was not an easy one, and this amply accounts for the startling means which the author here adopts. The story taken in itself is of the strangest character, but on examination it will be seen that the features which most astonish us are essential for the attainment of the didactic purpose. It would therefore be a waste of time to inquire how any ruler not completely insane could issue an edict forbidding his subjects to ask petitions of god or man, himself excepted, for the space of thirty days—why Darius adopts the singular proposal made to him without first consulting Daniel, who is his chief minister—why the enemies of Daniel are at one time represented as coercing the king, and at last are condemned to death en masse, together with their wives and children. Nothing can be more unfortunate than the attempts of apologists to make these things appear probable. Thus Hengstenberg and very many others have maintained that the edict of Darius was merely a claim to divine honours such as were paid to the ancient kings of Persia—as if under the kings of Persia it had ever been forbidden, on pain of death, to ask petitions of god or man! But when we consider the account of the edict in question as a literary device whereby the faithfulness of Daniel is conspicuously shewn forth, for the edification of Israelites persecuted on account of their religion, the difficulties are at once removed.

הָכְרִזּוּ is shewn by the Syr. pēyāsā “persuasion”, which is formed as if from a Peal, though the verb is apis, Gr. πείσωται. De Vogué has argued from the inscription לְכָרְזִים on a seal of uncertain date (though from the writing it would appear to be very ancient) that the Aramaic root נָגַן has no connection with Greek (see the Corpus Inscr. Sem. Pt. 2, N° 86).

That this narrative is based on a historical tradition cannot be argued with any show of reason, for, as we have seen (p. 19),

Darius the Mede is unknown to history. It has often been supposed that the Darius of Daniel is a confused reminiscence of the historical Darius Hystaspis, but this is scarcely probable. The author of Daniel knew of four Persian kings (chap. xi. 2), of whom the first is Cyrus and the last doubtless Xerxes. The other two are presumably Darius and Artaxerxes. But the name Xerxes (חֶרְשָׁוִיָּה) appears in Daniel as the name of the father of Darius the Mede (chap. ix. 1). Thus it would seem that the author, knowing that there had existed a Median Empire before the Persian supremacy began, but not knowing any real Median names, gave Persian names to his Median kings. If it be asked why a Median king, not Cyrus the Persian, is represented as taking possession of the Chaldean Empire, the answer is found in the Old Testament itself. For in several passages written during the Exile (Is. xiii. 17; Jer. li. 11, 28) it is predicted that the Medes will conquer Babylon. This the author of Daniel, who knew something of the prophetical books, supposes actually to have taken place.

2—10. For the word אֲחִישָׁדְרֹפְנִיא see chap. iii. 2. In this chapter the 120 “satraps” are evidently not satraps in the real sense of the word, for in the time of Darius Hystaspis the whole Persian Empire contained only 20 satrapies (Herod. III. 89)<sup>1</sup>. Perhaps the 120 satrapies may be merely a variation of the 127 provinces into which, according to Esth. i. 1, the Persian Empire was divided. עַלְּתָה (v. 3) “higher than”, “above”, does not occur again in Biblical Aramaic; its opposite is תְּרֻעָה (chap. ii. 39, Kethib). סָרָקִין, which is found also in the Targums, seems to be from a Persian word sarak “chief” (formed from sar “head”), cf. Syr. سَرَقَنْ from سَرَقَنْ. In v. 4 עַשְׂתָה is usually taken as a Perfect, with scriptio plena, for שָׁבֵעַ or שָׁבֵעַ, but according to Nöldke it is a participle, passive in form though in meaning merely intransitive, i.e. “the king (was) minded” etc. (see the Götting. gel. Anzeigen, 1884, p. 1019). After the verb עַשְׂכַּלְתָּה (v. 6) we must of course understand נָלַע; for the use of the Perfect referring to the future after נָלַע trap”, is sometimes used by later Arabic writers for Persian officials generally.

<sup>1</sup> Similarly the title marzbān, which under the Sāsānian dynasty corresponded in meaning to the older “sa-

הַשְׁפָל in the Mishnah (Abōth II. 5; iv. 18). The original meaning of the root שָׁדֵר or שָׁלֵל seems to be that of “setting in motion”, hence אֲשֶׁרְמִיר “commotion”, “rebellion”, Ezra iv. 15, Syr. shaddar “to send”, Jewish Aram. שְׁלַל “to persuade”, prop. “to incite”, “urge on”, and Arab. sadara or sadala “to let loose”, applied to hair, garments, etc.<sup>1</sup> בְּתִרְיָא “continually” (v. 17) is in the Targums usually תְּרִירָא; the word is derived by Gesenius, no doubt correctly, from דָּר “to revolve”—that it can have anything to do with שָׁדֵר (Kautzsch, Gramm. p. 112) is impossible. On הַיְתִית (v. 18) see chap. iii. 13. The form שְׁמַת “was placed” is very peculiar, since the analogy both of Biblical Aramaic and of Arabic would lead us to expect שְׁמַת, שְׁמַת, as Kautzsch proposes to read (Gramm. p. 74). Instead of the חַתְּקָה of the ordinary editions, Baer has חַתְּמָה; for he reads וְבַעֲוֹקָתָה (plur. constr.), following the best MSS. “That nothing might be changed concerning Daniel”, i.e. that nothing might be done to rescue him. צָבֵי prop. “purpose”, “intention”, is here used, as in Syriac, in a perfectly vague sense.

19—29. טַנְתָּ “in a state of fasting” (from t̄l̄wāyāt̄) is properly a fem. substantive in the absolute state, used adverbially (cf. Hebr. מִתְהַרְהָה “quickly”). The meaning of טַנְתָּ is unknown. Theodotion and the P̄eshītā render it by “food”, the medieval Jewish commentators by “instruments of music”, while most moderns take it as “concubines”, in accordance with a significance which the Arabic verb dahā sometimes conveys; in Aramaic and Hebrew, however, the root דָחַ, דָחַה, always means “to thrust away”, “overthrow”—it is only in Arabic that it has acquired the sense of “spreading out” like a carpet (Koran LXXIX. 30), whence its metaphorical application is derived. Rossmüller compares the Arab. dukhān “smoke”, and explains טַנְתָּ as “incense”, “odours”. With the clause גַּדְתָּ עַלְוָה cf. chap. ii. 1. שְׁמַתָּ is written with Dāghesh forte, according to the analogy of such words as פְּלִתָּה, although the root is not שָׁמַן but שָׁנַן (cf. Syr. shennēthā, constr. shennath). “Then the king rose at dawn, as soon as it was light” (v. 20)—שְׁפָרְפָּרָא, which is used in the Targums also, has almost exactly the same sense as גַּנְגָּה אָנָּה; in Syriac and Arabic we find the simple forms, shaphrū and safar respectively. The phrase בְּקֶל עֲזֵיב “with a lamentable voice” (v. 21) occurs again in the Palestinian Targum, Exod. xii. 31. עֲזֵיב is from עִזֵּב “to bind”, a root common to Syriac and Arabic, the ideas of “tightness” and “pain” being closely connected in the Semitic languages<sup>1</sup>. In v. 22 the verb מָלַל “he spake” is construed with בְּ, as often happens in Syriac even when the meaning is simply “to speak to”, not “to hold a conversation with”<sup>2</sup>. In v. 24 the Perfect טָאָב (Syr. tē'ebh) seems to have been formed on the analogy of בָּאָב (see v. 15), since in the former word the בְּ does not properly belong to the root, as the Hebrew and Arabic forms shew. With נִסְקָה for נִסְקָה cf. חַנְעָלָה chap. iv. 3; on הַיּוֹם see chap. ii. 45. אַרְשִׁית (v. 25) is formed from אַרְשָׁע (chap. ii. 39) as in Hebrew “the lowest part” (Exod. xix. 17) from פָּתָח. The decree of Darius in vv. 26—28 is mostly composed of phrases used in chaps. ii. 44; iii. 31—33; v. 19. Before רַיְלָא חַתְּכָל (v. 27) we must, of course, understand מָלְכוּ. Verse 29, as contrasted with the corresponding passage, chap. iii. 30, uses הַצְלָחָה in the intransitive sense.

<sup>1</sup> See Nöldeke in the Z. D. M. G. xl. p. 735—תְּרִירָא is there, of course, a misprint for תְּרִירָה:

CHAPTER VII.

We now enter upon the second part of the book, describing four visions seen by Daniel. These pieces purport to have been written by Daniel himself, for in chap. vii. 1 we are told that he “wrote the dream”, and from that point to the end of the book he speaks in the first person, the sole exception being the heading of chap. x. Though Daniel is never actually designated as a prophet, the literary form of the visions is, to a large

<sup>5</sup> Cf. in Arabic يَوْم عَصِيب “a painful day” (Koran xi. 79); Al-Bai-

dāwī explains the word عَصِيب as شَدِيدٌ مِّنْ عَصِبَةٍ إِذَا شَدَهُ.

Hebrew this root is used only in the derived sense (I Kings i. 6. Is. lxiii. 10); עֲשֵׂב “to fashion” (Job x. 8) is quite different and probably corresponds to Arab. عَصَب “to cut”.

<sup>2</sup> Exactly similar is the modern Persian use of bā with guftan.

extent, borrowed from the prophetical writings. Thus, in chaps. vii. and viii., Daniel, like Zechariah, is shewn visible objects of which the symbolical meaning is forthwith explained to him by angels. Other details were doubtless suggested by the book of Ezekiel. The author of Daniel likewise follows the prophets in prefixing dates to the visions. This custom was, among the ancient prophets, a perfectly reasonable one, for as their visions referred primarily to the circumstances of the moment, it was desirable, for the right understanding of the piece, that the reader should be informed of its date. But in the visions of Daniel the real subject is always "the time of the end", not the time in which Daniel lived, so that the prefixing of a date is unessential.

The vision in chap. vii. differs from the rest in that it takes the form of a dream, based upon the same idea as the dream of Nebuchadnezzar in chap. ii. In both chapters we read of Four Gentile Empires, in both the Fourth Empire is dwelt upon at much greater length than the first three, and in both it is predicted that the Fourth Empire will be overthrown by a divine interposition, in order that an everlasting kingdom may be set up. Here the resemblance between the two visions ceases. In chap. ii. 41—43 much stress is laid upon the divisions of the Fourth Empire, but chap. vii. passes them over in silence. Moreover in chap. ii. 34, 35, 44, all the Four Empires perish alike, whereas in chap. vii. 11, 12 the Fourth Beast only is destroyed, the other Beasts being suffered to live, though they are deprived of their dominion. But what especially distinguishes chap. vii. is the prominence which it gives to the last king of the Fourth Empire, who is represented by "a little horn", and who "wages war against the Saints".

To argue from these divergences that the Four Empires of chap. ii. are not the same as those of chap. vii., or that the two chapters are the work of different authors, is altogether unreasonable. We have no right to expect in an apocalyptic writing that strict consistency which we naturally demand of a historian. We must also make allowance for the different frame-work of the two chapters. Chap. ii. describes a revelation sent to Nebuchadnezzar (see vv. 29, 30, 45), whereas chap.

vii. is a revelation sent to Daniel, the representative of the true Israel. Hence it is only in the second case that the sufferings of the Saints in the last days can be appropriately mentioned<sup>1</sup>.

We may therefore assume, with the great majority of modern interpreters, that the Empires in chap. vii., as in chap. ii., are (1) the Babylonian, (2) the Median, (3) the Persian, (4) the Greek or Macedonian. It is also clear that the "little horn" is Antiochus Epiphanes. This was distinctly recognized by Porphyry, and must also have been known to the Jews of the 4th century after Christ, since it is the interpretation given by Ephraim Syrus, who was quite incapable of inventing it. At the present day it is so generally admitted as not to require demonstration. But there are two questions which deserve to be more particularly examined, namely (1) What are the "ten horns" of the Fourth Beast? and (2) What is meant by the One like a son of man who comes with the clouds of heaven?

As to the former question, there can at least be no doubt that the "ten horns" represent ten individual kings (see v. 24), not ten kingdoms, as is the case with the "four horns" of chap. viii. 8. This appears from the fact that in chap. vii. 8 the "little horn" rises among the ten horns, which is explained, in v. 24, to mean that after ten kings have arisen, another king will arise. In chap. viii. 9, on the contrary, the "little horn" rises out of one of the four horns. If therefore the Fourth Beast of chap. vii. is the Greek Empire and the little horn is Antiochus, it follows that the ten horns must be ten predecessors of Antiochus. So far most interpreters are agreed, but as to the identification of these ten predecessors there is great difference of opinion. According to Bertholdt and Von Lengerke, the ten kings are (1) Seleucus Nicator, (2) Antiochus Soter, (3) Antiochus Theos, (4) Seleucus Callinicus, (5) Seleucus Cera-hence argues that the author of chap. ii. cannot have written the latter part of the book. I may here mention that De Lagarde, in the Gött. gel. Anzeigen for 1891, pp. 497—520, has endeavoured to prove that Dan. vii. was composed in the year 69 after Christ.

<sup>1</sup> This obvious consideration is overlooked by Meinhold, who says, in discussing chap. ii., "Was c. 7. 8. 11 besonders betont ist, dass in der Endzeit Israel hart bedrückt sein, aber aus der äussersten Not von Gott befreit werde, fehlt hier gerade" (Kurzgefasster Commentar, 8te Abt. p. 274), and

nus, (6) Antiochus the Great, (7) Seleucus Philopator, (8) Heliodorus, (9) Ptolemy Philometor, (10) Demetrius Soter. Others, as Hitzig, Cornill, and Kuenen, begin with Alexander the Great. This is decidedly more natural, for if the Fourth Beast represents the Greek supremacy, why should Alexander be omitted? It is true that in chap. viii. a distinction is made between "the great horn" (Alexander) and the horn out of which "the little horn" rises, but this is because the "four horns" of chap. viii. are contemporaneous kingdoms, not a series of successive kings. In chap. vii. nothing is said about the divisions of the Macedonian Empire—we have only a series of kings; hence Alexander must head the list. We have also to consider that the ten kings are mentioned, not on their own account, but because they lead up to the eleventh (Antiochus Epiphanes), i.e. the number 10 is introduced only in order that the readers may the more clearly recognize who is meant by the "little horn". Accordingly Hitzig and Cornill believe the ten kings to be (1) Alexander the Great, (2) Seleucus Nicator, (3) Antiochus Soter, (4) Antiochus Theos, (5) Seleucus Callinicus, (6) Seleucus Ceraunus, (7) Antiochus the Great, (8) Seleucus Philopator, (9) Heliodorus, (10) Demetrius Soter.

Of the ten horns, we are told in v. 8, three are "plucked up" on the appearance of the eleventh horn—which signifies that the last king will "humble" three of the former kings (v. 24). Porphyry made these three kings to be (1) Ptolemy Philometor, (2) Ptolemy Euergetes II., his brother, and (3) Artaxias, king of Armenia, whom Antiochus Epiphanes defeated and took prisoner. In order to refute this interpretation Jerome strangely asserts that Ptolemy Philometor and Ptolemy Euergetes "died long before the birth of Antiochus"<sup>1</sup>. In reality they both survived him. But we may rightly urge against Porphyry's theory that these three kings were in no sense predecessors of Antiochus Epiphanes. That Ptolemy Philometor attempted to seize the throne of Syria on the death of Seleucus Philopator is a notion which rests on the sole authority of Porphyry himself (see Jerome on Dan. xi. 21), and it is highly probable that here, as in some other cases, Porphyry's statements are not derived from an independent historical source but are simply deductions drawn from Daniel. According to Von Lengerke, the three kings are (1) Heliodorus, (2) Ptolemy Philometor, and (3) Demetrius Soter. This interpretation is in part open to the same objections as the former one. It appears therefore much more reasonable to explain the three kings, with Hitzig and Cornill, as (1) Seleucus Philopator, (2) Heliodorus, and (3) Demetrius Soter. Seleucus Philopator, son of Antiochus the Great, died in 175 B.C. According to some historians he was murdered by his minister Heliodorus. In any case Heliodorus placed himself at the head of the state, but was very soon dispossessed by the brother of Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, who had secured the help of Eumenes king of Pergamum. Meanwhile Demetrius Soter, son of Seleucus Philopator and rightful heir to the throne, was living as a hostage at Rome, whither he had been sent shortly before his father's death<sup>1</sup>. It would seem, from this chapter of Daniel, that some persons at least attributed the death of Seleucus Philopator to the instigation of Antiochus Epiphanes—that the pious Jews should have believed their persecutor to be capable of any crime, was quite natural. Hence there is no difficulty in regarding Seleu-ἀρχὴν βιαζόμενον ἐκβάλλουσι, καὶ τὸν Ἀντίόχον ἐς αὐτὴν κατάγουσιν, ἐταιριζόμενοι τὸν ἄνδρα· ἀπὸ γὰρ τινῶν προσκρουμάτων ἡδη καὶ οἵδε Ῥωμαίους ὑπεβλέποντο. οὕτω μὲν Ἀντίόχος ὁ Ἀντιόχου τοῦ μεγάλου Συρίας ἐπεκράτησεν· ὅτῳ παρὰ τῶν Σύρων ἐπώνυμον ἦν ἐπιφανής, δι τῆς ἀρχῆς ἀρπαζομένης ὑπὸ ἀλλοτρίων βασιλεὺς οἰκείος ὥφθη”. Appian, Syr. 45. See also Livy xli. 19.

<sup>1</sup> "Frustra Porphyrius cornu parvulum quod post decem cornua ortum est, Epiphanem Antiochum suspicatur, et de decem cornibus tria evulsa cornua, sextum Ptolemaeum cognomento Philometorem, septimum Ptolemaeum Euergetem, et Artaxiam regem Armeniae, quorum priores multo antequam Antiochus nasceretur, mortui sunt.

Contra Artaxiam vero dimicasse quidem Antiochum novimus: sed illum in regno pristino permansisse". Jerome, Comm. in Dan. vii. 8. Appian says of Antiochus Epiphanes—Εστράτευσε δὲ καὶ ἐπὶ Ἀρταξίαν τὸν Ἄρμενων βασιλέα, καὶ αὐτὸν ἔλων ἐτελεύτησεν κ.τ.λ. (Syr. 45).

<sup>1</sup> “Ωδε μὲν Ῥωμαῖοι διέθεντο τὰ δορλκτηγα, Ἀντίόχου δ’ υστερον τοῦ μεγάλου βασιλέως τελευτήσαντος γίγνεται Σέλευκος ὁ νιὸς διάδοχος. καὶ τὸν ἀδελφὸν ὃδε Ἀντίόχου ἔξελυσε τῆς ὑπὸ Ῥωμαίοις ὁμηρείας, ἀντιδοὺς τὸν ἐαυτοῦ παῖδα Δημήτριον. Ἀντίόχου δ’ ἐπανίόντος ἐκ τῆς ὁμηρείας καὶ ὄντος ἐπὶ περὶ Ἀθήνας, ὃ μὲν Σέλευκος ἔξ ἐπιβούλης Ἡλιοδώρου τυὼν τῶν περὶ τὴν αὐλὴν ἀποθνήσκει, τὸν δ’ Ἡλιοδώρον Εὔμενης καὶ Ἀτταλος ἐς τὴν

cus Philopator and Heliodorus as two of the horns “plucked up” before Antiochus. But whether the last of the three horns is Demetrius Soter, appears more doubtful. The latter was not actually king, but merely heir to the kingdom. Could he therefore be considered as one of the three kings whom Antiochus “humbled”? The thing in itself is not unlikely. Von Gutschmid, however, has suggested (Kleine Schriften, Vol. II. pp. 175—179) that by the last of the three horns is meant, not Demetrius, but a brother of his, who, according to a fragment of John of Antioch, was put to death by Antiochus (see Müller, Fragm. hist. graec. IV. p. 558). This view Kuenen is inclined to adopt.

Much more important is the question as to the One like a son of man (vv. 13, 14). On this subject two opposite interpretations have existed from a very early period down to the present day. According to some, the One like a son of man represents the coming king, i.e. the Messiah; according to others he represents the kingdom of the Saints. The former view cannot be proved to have been known in pre-Christian times, for chaps. xlv—lvi of the Book of Enoch are of uncertain date, nor is it even settled whether they are the work of a Jew or of a Christian. But in the New Testament this view is constantly assumed, nor can there be any doubt that the term “the Son of man”, so frequent in the Gospels, contains an allusion to Dan. vii. 13. The Messianic interpretation seems to have been almost universal in the early Christian Church (see especially Justin’s Dialogue with Trypho, chap. xxxi), and is found likewise in the Babylonian Talmud (Sanh. 98<sup>a</sup>). In the Middle Ages it was maintained by Rashi and by most Jewish commentators. In modern times it has been defended by critics so impartial as Von Lengerke, Bleek, and Ewald.

Yet this view, popular as it has been, presents insuperable difficulties. In the first place the interpretation contained in this chapter of Daniel says not a word about a personal Messiah, but states expressly that the kingdom is to be given to the people of the Saints (vv. 18, 22, 27). If the Being who comes in the clouds represents a person, that person must surely be of immense importance. Why therefore does the angelic interpreter pass him over in complete silence, and speak of "the Saints" instead? Nor is it legitimate to argue that the description of this Being, in vv. 13 and 14, so clearly proves him to be personal as to render a special explanation unnecessary. The One like a son of man, that is, One in human form, obviously stands in contrast with the Four Beasts. Since the Four Beasts represent Four Empires, not four individual kings, it is reasonable to suppose that the One like a son of man also represents an Empire. The human form, as opposed to the bestial, teaches that the last kingdom will not be, like the Gentile kingdoms, a supremacy of brute force, but a supremacy essentially spiritual. As the Gentile Empires rise out of the sea (v. 3), so the last Empire comes with the clouds of heaven. The former statement is manifestly figurative, why therefore should the latter be taken literally? The rising out of the sea expresses the fact that the Gentile Empires are of this world (see v. 17); the coming with the clouds shews that the last Empire will be ushered in by the power of God. Thus in the chapter itself there is nothing which suggests the idea of a personal Messiah, and it is particularly important to observe that the rest of the book bears out this conclusion, for wherever the author speaks of the future kingdom he maintains the same significant silence as to a future king (chaps. ii. 44; xii. 3). Everything therefore tends to shew that the Being introduced in chap. vii. 13 represents the kingdom of the Israelite Saints. This interpretation was evidently known to Ephraim Syrus, and is accepted by Ben-Ezra. Such is also the view of Hitzig, Nöldeke, Schürer (Gesch. d. jüd. Volkes, II. p. 426), and most recent writers.

It has sometimes been objected that the idea of a future kingdom necessarily implied a personal king. But this is by no means borne out by facts. It is notorious that in several of the post-Biblical Jewish writings the future kingdom is conceived simply as a reign of Israel over the Gentiles, without any reference to a personal Messiah<sup>1</sup>. This is the case, for example, in the Assumptio Mosis and in the Book of Jubilees, both of which probably date from about the beginning of the Christian era.

<sup>1</sup> On the whole of this question see Prof. Stanton's work, "The Jewish and Christian Messiah" (1886), especially pp. 109—118.

1—6. In dating this vision from the first year of Belshazzar, whose death has been already related (chap. v. 30), the author purposely abandons the chronological order which he has hitherto followed, that is to say, the visions are not a continuation of the narratives but form a series by themselves. The words וְחִזּוּ רָאשָׁה עַל־מִשְׁבֵּת חֶלְםָם, cf.chap. vi. 10. “Then he wrote the dream”; at the beginning of this new portion of the book it was important to state that Daniel, like other seers, put his revelation in writing; in the case of the remaining visions this is not actually said but is everywhere assumed (see chap. xii. 4). רִאשׁ מִלְויָן “the sum of the matters”, that is, the essential import of the revelation, cf. Ps. cxix. 160. On the interjection אָרֶךְ (v. 2), see chap. ii. 31. מִנְיָן is usually taken as intransitive, “breaking forth upon the great sea”, according to Judg. xx. 33; but in this case we should expect עַל־מִקָּא or בַּיִתָּא. It therefore appears more natural to translate, with Levy (Chald. Wörterb. s.v. מִקָּא), “stirring up the great sea”; the phrase אֲנִיחָ קֹרֵב “to go to war”, lit. “to cause war to burst forth”, is extremely common in the Targums. “The great sea” is usually the Mediterranean (Josh. ix. 1). Here the sea represents the nations of the earth (cf. Is. xvii. 12), and accordingly, in v. 17, it is explained by אָרֶץ “the earth”<sup>1</sup>. In v. 3 the Four Beasts are described as “different one from the other”, because they symbolize different Empires. The first (v. 4) is the Babylonian. It appears as a lion with eagle’s wings; since it is the earliest of the great Empires, it is here compared to the noblest of beasts and the noblest of birds, just as in chap. ii. it is represented by the most precious of metals. גָּבִין “wings” is, as Nöldeke has shewn in the Gött. gel. Anz. for 1884, p. 1019, from the root נָרַף, cf. Arab. jadafa, “to fly”, “to row”. In Syriac also we find

<sup>1</sup> Prof. Robertson Smith suggests that the imagery in Dan. vii. 2 is borrowed from the ideas of cosmogony which were current in the ancient East. According to Philo of Byblus (quoted by Eusebius, Praep. Evang. i. chap. 10), the Phoenicians believed the world (Αἰών), personified as a man, to have been born ἐκ τοῦ Κολπία ἀνέμου καὶ γυναικὸς αὐτοῦ Βάσιον (i.e. Hebr. רְבָה). Here the wind Kolpia seems to be רְווֹחַ בְּלְפָנָה “the wind from every quarter”. For other explanations see Von Baudissin’s Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, 1876, i. p. 13.

geppā “wing”, but in the Targums the more primitive form נְפָרֵל occurs. “I looked until its wings were stript off, and it was lifted up from the earth and made to stand on two feet as a man, and a man's heart was given to it”. Von Lengerke explains these words as referring to the decline of the Babylonian Empire—the wings, the symbols of swiftness, are taken away, and it is reduced to the condition of an ordinary human being. But on this hypothesis the last clause would be meaningless, for “a man's heart” evidently implies superior intelligence, not loss of power. Accordingly Hitzig and Ewald see here an allusion to the experiences of Nebuchadnezzar in chap. iv. As in chap. ii. 38, Nebuchadnezzar and his Empire are treated as identical. The Babylonian Empire, on its first appearance, has a purely animal, i.e. heathen, character, but after a while the animal attributes disappear, the Empire is, as it were, humanized in the person of its representative. The passive Perfect הִקִּימָת clearly shews, by its second vowel, that it is not a Hebraism; the form exactly corresponds to the Arab. ukīmat, excepting that the initial נ has been retained. Verse 5 introduces the Median Empire, in the form of a bear. It is “raised up on one side”, i.e. half crouching, cf. chap. ii. 39 where the Median Empire is described as “lower” than the Babylonian. שֶׁבַע “side” is in the Targums קֹפֵר stat. emphat.; some editions wrongly read לִלְשֹׁרִיד. The vocalization הַקִּמָת, in some editions הִקִּימָת, assumes that the verb is transitive, “it raised one side”, but probably we should read הַקִּמָת or הַקִּימָת, as in v. 4. The meaning of the “three ribs in its mouth between its teeth” is very obscure. Most commentators refer this to three countries (Ewald), or three cities (Hitzig), which were conquered by the Medes. According to Von Lengerke, the author intends merely to represent the Median Empire as a ravenous beast devouring the remains of some slain enemy, the “three” being a round number. At all events the following words, “And thus they spake to it, Arise, devour much flesh”, seem to shew that the Medes are here regarded as a power whose chief characteristic is destruction—an idea suggested by those passages of the prophets in which the Medes are summoned to ravage Babylon (Is. xiii. 17. Jer. li. 11, 28). The leopard (v. 6), representing the Persian Empire, has four wings (i.e. its power extends in all directions, towards the four quarters of the earth), and four heads, by which are meant the four Persian kings (see chap. xi. 2). על־גביה (Keri) is usually translated “on its back”, but the plural form favours the rendering “on its sides” (cf. Syr. gabbā “side”, from the root גַבָּ). The clause, “and dominion was given to it”, is added in order to emphasize the vastness of the Persian Empire, cf. chap. ii. 39 where this Empire is described as “ruling over all the earth”.

7, 8. The Fourth Beast, i.e. the Greek Empire, is too fearful to be likened to any known creature; both in strength and fierceness it far surpasses its predecessors. We are so accustomed to consider the Graeco-Macedonian power as a civilizing agency that this description seems at first singularly inappropriate. We should however remember that the work of Alexander must have appeared to Orientals in a light very different from that in which we usually regard it. The former Empires had generally involved nothing more than conquest, and had left local customs untouched; the Macedonian Empire was, in the fullest sense, “different from all Empires” (v. 23), since it produced a radical transformation of the old oriental world. Moreover the atrocious massacres, at Tyre and elsewhere, by which Alexander endeavoured to strike terror into the conquered races, were not easily forgotten, and amply suffice to explain the image here employed—that of a monster “devouring, crushing, and stamping the residue under foot”. אִמְתָּנִי “terrible” is the fem. stat. absol. of אִמְתָּן, which occurs in the Targums; in Syriac, adjectives in -thān form their fem. stat. absol. in -thānyā, not -thānī. The reading אִמְתָּנִי, found in some editions, is erroneous. Besides the “iron teeth”, v. 19 mentions “claws of brass”, but Ewald is scarcely justified in inserting these words into v. 7, in order to assimilate the two passages; it would be equally reasonable to insert v. 21 after v. 8. On the “ten horns”, see the Introduction to the chapter. With v. 8 compare the parallel passage, chap. viii. 9. Antiochus Epiphanes is represented by a “little horn” because he at first appeared feeble and seized the throne by “treachery” (chap. xi. 21). זָרֵי is doubtless an old diminutive form, from zu'air. Instead of the normal סְלִקָת, the Masora prescribes סְלִקָת קֶרֶרִי. On אֲתַעֲרוּ (K̄erī) see chap. v. 5. The “eyes like the eyes of a man” are the symbol of intelligence, cf. viii. 23 where Antiochus is designated as מִבֵּן חִידּוֹת. The “mouth speaking great things” is an allusion to his pride and especially to his blasphemies against the God of Israel (chap. xi. 36).

9—14. The Divine judgment upon the Gentile power is now executed. The scene described is obviously intended to be figurative, since those who are judged are primarily Empires, not individuals; cf. Joel iv. 1, 2, a passage which the author of Daniel may have had in his mind. The forensic imagery is here consistently carried out. Thrones for the heavenly powers are set up, God Himself appears in the likeness of an aged man seated among flames, which, according to the well-known conception of the ancient Hebrews, are the accompaniment of the Deity (Ps. xviii. 9), and the books, recording the crimes of the Gentile potentates, are opened<sup>1</sup>. On the form קְרֻשָׁנָן see chaps. v. 20; vi. 8. With רָמוּ “were placed” compare the Syriac use of rēme “thrown” for “lying”, and the Hebr. יָרִיתִי Gen. xxxi. 51. Here, as in chap. iv. 14, the heavenly powers are associated with God Himself in judgment. With שְׁמִיקָה יְמִין “one ancient of days” cf. the Hebr. בְּאַבְּיִם Gen. xxiv. 1 etc. “His raiment was like pure snow and the hair of His head like spotless wool”; most commentators, discarding the Masoretic accentuation, render, “His raiment was white like snow”. On שְׁבָבִין see chap. iii. 22. That the throne has “wheels” is in accordance with Ezek. i. and x. In v. 10 נָגַד וְנָפַךְ seems to mean “was advancing and coming forth”, נָגַד being used in its primitive sense (cf. Hebr. נָגַד “in front”). For the imagery, cf. אָשָׁלְפִיו תְּאַכֵּל Ps. l. 3. On אלפים אֲלָפִין (K̄erī), see chap. iv. 14. For the genuine Aramaic (pron. רְבָנָן) the K̄erī substitutes the Hebrewized form רְבָבָן, as if from a Sing. רְבָבָה corresponding to Hebr. רְבָבָה. רְבָבָה “the judgment sate”—דִינָא יָתַב here means that He knoweth; it is reserved, laid up in writing, and kept in store against the day of reckoning, or else requited speedily.” (xvi. 26, 27 Ahlw.)

<sup>1</sup> The same metaphor is used by the “heathen” Arabic poet Zuhair, “Hide not from God that which ye devise, hoping that it will be concealed, for whatever men seek to hide from God

“those who judge”, compare the use of סֹלֶר “deliberation” for “persons who deliberate” (Jer. xxiii. 18. Ps. lxxxix. 8). In v. 11 the Greek Empire is finally destroyed on account of the blasphemies of Antiochus Epiphanes, the idea being that in him the guilt of the Empire reached its height (cf. בְּרִיתָם הַפְּשָׁעִים chap. viii. 23). The other Beasts (v. 12) are humbled, though not destroyed, i.e. Gentile kingdoms are still to exist for a while, but they are to acknowledge the supremacy of the Saints (cf. vv. 14, 27. Is. lx. 10, 12). It may seem illogical that the Beasts, who represent Empires, should be said to lose their Empire; what the author means is that the nations once dominant are to survive the loss of their dominion. On אֲרָכָה, see chap. iv. 24. In v. 14 the eternal sovereignty of the Saints is described in terms applied elsewhere to the sovereignty of God Himself (chaps. iii. 33; iv. 31; vi. 27).

15—28. In vv. 15 ff. the narration of the dream continues. The author, in order the more clearly to explain his meaning, represents Daniel as being troubled by what he had seen and as questioning “one of those that stood by”, i.e. one of the attendant angels mentioned in v. 10. The angel first gives a brief and general answer (vv. 17, 18), and afterwards, when Daniel desires more special information as to the Fourth Beast, supplies further details (vv. 23—27). Instead of the more primitive ithkaryath, which would correspond to the Syriac form) is, if correctly pointed, taken from the masc. אַתְּבָרִית (cf. Hebr. פְּרִיה from primitive pāriyat). For the idea, cf. וְתַקְשֵׁעַם רְוִיחָו ch. ii. 1. The construction רְוִיחָו אֲנָה רְגִיאָל is the same as מֵאֲנָה אַרְפְּחָשָׁקָא Ezra vii. 21. Instead of (so Baer) most editions have נְגִינָה. The word occurs again in I Chr. xxi. 27 (נְגִינָה “its sheath”), and appears in the Targums both as נְדִינָה and לְדִינָה; it is no doubt derived from the Persian nidāna (in Sanscrit nidhāna) “vessel”, “receptacle”. In Daniel therefore the correct pronunciation is probably “its sheath” (see Nöldeke in the Gött. gel. Anz. for 1884, p. 1022—תְּגִינָה, in the note, is of course a misprint). The “sheath” of the soul is the body; for the image cf. Job xxvii. 8. In v. 17 the Keri substitutes the fem. אֲנֵנָה (Syr. ennēn) for אֲנָה (Syr. ennōn), which is properly masc. (cf. chap. vi. 25). “אַרְבָּשָׁה מֶלֶכִים” “four kings”, i.e. four heathen Empires. יְקֻלָּוּ מֶלֶכְותָּא (v. 18) “they shall receive the kingdom”, i.e. they shall come into possession of supreme power (cf. chap. vi. 1). The Israelite Saints, who are also called simply קָדוֹשִׁין (vv. 21, 22) are here, as in vv. 22, 25, 27, described as קָדוֹשִׁי עַלְיוֹנִין (LXX. and Theod. ἀγιοι ὑψίστου, Pesh. ~~פָּגָע~~

Since קָדוֹשׁ is used especially of angels (see chap. iv. 10), there can be no doubt that the author has selected the phrase קָדוֹשׁ in order to express the heavenly character of Israel as contrasted with the nations of the earth. עַלְיוֹן “the Most High”, as a name of God, is the Hebrew equivalent of אֱלֹהָה, עַלְלָה (Dan. iv. 14, 21); the use of the Plur. עַלְיוֹנִין is probably to be explained, with Hitzig, as due to the Plural preceding—so also we find בְּתַּי בְּלָאִים used as the Plural of בֵּית בָּלָא (Is. xlvi. 7, 22). Others take עַלְיוֹנִין as a Plural of majesty, but in the case of an Adjective this hypothesis is precarious. אֲצֹבֵת (v. 19) “I desired to have certain knowledge”; the verb יָאַב bears somewhat the same relation to the Adj. (see v. 16) that the Arab. aikana “to be sure” bears to yakīn “sure”. Verse 20 is mainly a repetition from vv. 7 and 8, but it adds, respecting the eleventh horn, the words וְחִזְנָה בְּבֵן מִיחְכְּרָתָה “and its appearance was greater than (that of) the rest”. This in no wise contradicts the expression “a little horn” (v. 8), as is shewn by chap. viii. 9, where the “little horn” rapidly grows to a portentous size. Verses 21 and 22 are a parenthesis, in which Daniel recapitulates what he has witnessed, at the same time adding fresh details; that the horn in question waged war against the Saints had not been mentioned previously, and indeed it is difficult to imagine how Daniel could “see” such a war taking place. דִּינָא יְהָב (v. 22) is usually explained as “justice was done”, i.e. the judicial sentence was pronounced in favour of the Saints. But perhaps Ewald may be right in reading וְרִיקָא יְתַב וְשַׁלְטָנוֹא [יְהָב] “and the judgment sate and the sovereignty was given” etc., cf. vv. 14, 26, 27. וְיָמָא מְטָא “and the time came”, i.e. the time fixed by God as the limit of the heathen domination. When the angel states, in v. 23, that the Fourth Empire is to “devour the whole earth”, this must, of course, be taken in a rhetorical sense; similarly in chap. ii. 39 the Third Empire, i.e. the Persian, “bears rule over all the earth”. In v. 25, לְעֵד “against” has much the same meaning as נָגֵר in chap. x. 13; the parallel passage, chap. xi. 36, uses עַל. אֲנָא יִכְבֹּה seems to mean “he shall afflict”, cf. I Chr. xvii. 9 where לְבָלָתָה is substituted for the לְעֵדוֹת of II Sam. vii. 10; elsewhere the Hebr. בָּלָה takes an impersonal object (Is. lxv. 22. Job xxi. 13. Lam. iii. 4—from the corrupt passage Ps. xlix. 15 no conclusion can be drawn). “And he shall think to change seasons and law, and they shall be given into his hand for a time and times and half a time”. The primary reference is to the attempt of Antiochus to suppress the Jewish religion; perhaps other acts of the king may also be alluded to, for according to I Macc. i. 41, 42, which can scarcely be a pure fiction, he appears to have interfered even with heathen cults (see chap. xi. 37). By זָמִינִים are meant, not only the great religious feasts, but all religious observances which take place at fixed times (cf. Numb. xxviii. 2). דָת is used, as in chap. vi. 6, for “the code of religious precepts” (Hebr. תֹּורָה); in Rabbinical Hebrew דָת often means “religion” generally. With שָׁנָה וְשָׁנָה וְשָׁנָה cf. chap. xii. 7. Almost all commentators recognize that “a time” is “a year” and that שָׁנִין has a Dual sense (cf. שָׁנִין v. 8)<sup>1</sup>. Thus the Jewish cult is to be “given into the hand” of Antiochus, i.e. abolished by him, for three years and a half (see the Introduction to chap. viii). In v. 26 יָתַב is, of course, the ordinary Imperfect Peal of יָתַב and corresponds to Syr. nettebh; Baer absurdly takes it to be a contraction of יָתַבְּ. The object of שָׁדֶסֶחֶת אֱלֹהִים is understood. The object of לְהַשְׁמָךְ אֱלֹהִים is شְׁלֹטָנָה understood. In (v. 27) the words קְלָבִנָה תְּחֽוֹת קְלָשִׁמְיָא are treated as a substantive, i.e. “the majesty of the kingdoms of (the regions) under the whole heaven”; so in Syriac حَدَبْ حَتَنْدَه “between the eyes” is used for “forehead” (Pesh. Ezek. iii. 7, 8). יְהִבָּת “shall have been given”—for this use of the Perfect to express certainty cf. גַּשְׁתָּחָה chap. xi. 36. The suffixes in מְלֻכִּתָה and לְהִ are שָׁם (cf. שָׁם chap.

<sup>1</sup> In Syriac, as is well known, the old Dual termination ain, ayin, almost always becomes in and is thus indistinguishable from the Plural.

xi. 32). In v. 28 Daniel closes the account of the vision—"So far is the end (i.e. limit) of the matter". אֵת לָמָד includes the whole revelation, both the things seen by Daniel and the things spoken by the angel, cf. פֶּגְבָּר chap. x. 1.

CHAPTER VIII.

As to the general sense of this chapter there has been comparatively little difference of opinion. In vv. 20—25 the author gives so clear an explanation of the vision that even the Christian Fathers could not wholly fail to grasp its meaning. Some details, however, still remain obscure, which is probably due in part to corruptions of the text.

The vision is dated from the third year of Belshazzar but it contains no reference to the Babylonian Empire. Its main subject is the rise and the conclusion of the Greek Empire, which, as we have seen, is the Fourth Empire of chaps. ii. and vii. The author therefore passes as rapidly as possible over the pre-Greek period, and after mentioning the conquests of Alexander hastens on to relate the history of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is represented, as in chap. vii., by a "little horn". Jerome and nearly all modern apologists, while denying that Antiochus Epiphanes is the "little horn" of chap. vii., fully admit that he is the "little horn" of chap. viii., and many fanciful attempts have been made to shew that the two descriptions cannot possibly refer to the same person. But to an impartial reader no real contradiction will appear to exist.

The principal difficulty in this chapter is the statement that the suspension of the daily sacrifice, in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, will last 2300 evenings and mornings (v. 14), i.e. 1150 days. How is this to be reconciled with chaps. vii. 25; ix. 27; xii. 7, 11, 12? The question is confessedly obscure, and any explanation should be offered with diffidence. It must first be remarked that these five passages agree at least in making the final distress last during three years and a fraction—the only difference lies in the magnitude of the fraction. Chaps.

vii. 25 ; ix. 27 ; xii. 7 offer comparatively little difficulty, for it might be supposed that the "times, time and half a time", and the "half of the week", are mere rough computations. But where the days are counted, no such vagueness can be admitted. The question therefore is, Do the 1150 days begin at the same moment as the 1290 days of chap. xii. 11? The mention of the abolition of the daily sacrifice in both passages certainly appears to indicate that this is the case. Accordingly a period of 140 days must elapse between the end of the 1150 days and that of the 1290 days. Perhaps the most probable hypothesis is that the author of Daniel, like most of the later Jews, regarded the future redemption of Israel, not as a single momentary act, but rather as a series of events, which might be separated by intervals of some months. After 1150 days from the abolition of the daily sacrifice (i.e. near the beginning of the year 164 B.C.<sup>1</sup>) the Jewish worship in the Temple was to be restored, but the time of affliction was to last for 140 days longer, and after 45 more days the period of complete rest was to set in (chap. xii. 11, 12). It is noteworthy that the author of Zechariah xii—xiv. represents the final deliverance of Israel as about to take place at a time when Jerusalem is being besieged by the heathen (Zech. xiv. 2—4). If, as is in itself highly probable, the author of Daniel shared this belief, we can understand why the cleansing of the sanctuary precedes, by some months, the final consummation, for in order that the nations may be "gathered against Jerusalem to battle", it is necessary that the city should first have been restored to Israel. By what means the restoration of the city is to be brought about, we are not told.

Cornill, who believes the book of Daniel to have been written soon after the Purification of the Temple (which took place near the end of the year 165 B.C.), supposes that this event forms the conclusion of the 1150 days; since the desecration of the Temple lasted only three years, he is obliged to make the 1150 days begin, not with the cessation of the daily sacrifice, but with the publication of the edict against Judaism (I Macc. i. 41 ff.), which he places at the end of October 168 B.C. This theory involves a considerable straining of the text, for why should the daily sacrifice be mentioned in Dan. viii. 13, if in reality the starting-point of the 1150 days has no connection with it? Moreover it is hardly credible that chaps. ix, xi and xii were composed after the Purification of the Temple, for in chap. ix. 17 the sanctuary is still "desolate", and the last vision recorded, which distinctly mentions the cessation of the daily sacrifice (xi. 31; xii. 11), says nothing about its restoration. Thus we are forced to conclude that when the book was finished, the restoration of the daily sacrifice was still future.

<sup>1</sup> I here follow Schürer in supposing that the desecration of the Temple took place near the end of the year 168 B.C. (Gesch. d. jüd. Volkes, I. 155).

But some scholars, e.g. Kuenen (Historisch-critisch Onderzoek, 2nd ed. II. 455), place it a year later.

1—4. For the construction אֵלֶּנִיאָלְךָ אַנְּיִךְ cf. chap. vii. 15, and for the vocalization of הַגְּרָאָה, where the article is taken by the Masoretes as equivalent to the relative, cf. I Kings xi. 9. Is. lvi. 3. בְּפִתְחָה is not "in the beginning" but "previously", and refers of course to chap. vii. (cf. chap. ix. 21. Gen. xlivi. 18, 20). In v. 2 the seer finds himself carried in a vision to Shushan, as Ezekiel was carried to Jerusalem (Ezek. xl. 1—3). Shushan (Susa), the capital of Susiana, was one of the principal residences of the Achaemenid kings (Neh. i. 1), and appears from the book of Esther to have been regarded by the later Jews as the seat of the Persian Empire<sup>1</sup>. Hence it is chosen to be the scene of this vision which describes the overthrow of the Medes and Persians by Alexander. כִּירָה "fortress", "citadel", seems to be the Assyrio-Babylonian birtu (Friedr. Delitzsch, Assyr. Gramm., Glossary), and occurs first in Nehemiah<sup>2</sup>. The fortress of Susa was celebrated in antiquity (Herod. v. 49. Polyb. v. 48). The author speaks of Susa as being "in the province Elam" (i.e. Elymaïs). Elam is here used in its wider sense and includes Susiana, from which it is distinguished in Ezra iv. 9. אֲגָלְךָ "stream", which occurs here only, seems to be a mere phonetic variation of יַבְלָךְ (Jer. xvii. 8). Ulai has long ago been identified with the Eulaeus, the river on which, according to Pliny and Arrian, Susa was situated. Herodotus, on the other hand, places Susa on the Choaspes, and it is not clear whether both names belonged to the same river or whether different rivers are meant<sup>1</sup>. The Eulaeus seems to be identical with the modern Kārūn. In v. 3 the empires of the Medes and Persians (see v. 20) appear to Daniel in the form of a ram—a well-known symbol of power and dominion (Ezek. xxxix. 18)<sup>2</sup>. That a single animal represents both the Median and the Persian Empires is due to the fact that the two nations are regarded as being akin to one another; but in order to shew that the period of Median supremacy and the period of Persian supremacy are distinct, the author tells us that the higher horn of the ram rose last. קָרְנֵי תַּחֲלָה “opposite the stream”, cf. נִבְרָשָׁת לְקֶבֶל chap. v. 5. קָרְנֵי קָרְנֵי (v. 7) are Duals, but, for some reason which it is impossible to guess, the first part of the word is vocalized according to the analogy of Plurals; similar cases are קָרְכִּים Prov. xxviii. 6, 18 and קָלְתִּים, if this be from קָלַת. קָלַת is here used for חָרָשָׁת, in opposition to חָשָׁת, cf. Gen. i. 5, 8; ii. 11, 13. The ram pushes westward, northward, and southward, but not eastward, for the eastern conquests of the Achaemenidae, which extended as far as India, are of no interest from the point of view of the Jews. In v. 4 חָגַדְתִּי, as in v. 8, does not mean “became great”, but “did great things” (Ewald).

<sup>1</sup> In much later times the tomb of the prophet Daniel was shewn at Susa or, as it was called by the Persians, Shûsh (Nöldeke, Tabari, p. 58).

<sup>2</sup> Ezra vi. 2 is probably of later date.

5—8. צָפֵר שָׂוִים or מְבִין “observing”, cf. Is. lvii. 1. צָפֵר occurs also in Ezra viii. 35. II Chron. xxix. 21; in Biblical Aramaic likewise we find צָפֵר שָׂוִין Ezra vi. 17, in Syriac sephrāyā. Perhaps the word may have been borrowed from the Aramaic—in older Hebrew a he-goat is usually שָׂעִיר or שָׂעִיר עַיִם. The original meaning of צָפֵר is obscure; that it is connected with the Arab. ضَفَر “to leap” is improbable, since the cases in which Arab. ض seems to correspond to Aramaic צ are extremely few (see Wright, Comp. Gramm. pp. 62, 63), and perhaps not one of them is certain. With the phrase על־צָמֵן כָּל־הָאָרֶץ “over the face of all the earth” Von Lengerke rightly compares I Macc. i. 3, where it is said of Alexander διῆλθεν ἔως ἀκρων τῆς γῆς. That the he-goat moves without touching the earth signifies the incredible rapidity of the Greek conquests — the invaders seemed rather to fly than to march. וְאֵין נָגַע בָּאָרֶץ should probably be taken as equivalent to v. 27. אֲאֵין נָגַע בָּאָרֶץ, the suffix being understood as in v. 27. קָרְנוֹ חִזְוִית “a conspicuous horn”, called in vv. 8 and 21 “the great horn”. בְּקָרְמָת בָּחָם (v. 6) “in the fury of his might”; חָמָה is originally “heat”, and may express the “impetuosity” of an onset, just as elsewhere it expresses the “virulence” of a poison (Deut. xxxii. 24. Ps. lviii. 5). In v. 7 לְאַלְיָן must be taken as indicating closer proximity than שׁ in v. 6. For וַיַּחַטֵּר מֶרֶךְ אַלְיָן “and he was angered against him”, see p. 30; אל is here used for לְיָ. חִזְוִות אַרְבָּעָה (v. 8) is usually rendered “four conspicuous horns” (Von Lengerke, Hitzig), or, “as it were four horns” (Ewald). Both interpretations, however, are extremely forced, and there can be little doubt that Graetz is right in reading אַחֲרוֹת for חִזְוִות, according to the LXX. καὶ ἀνέβη ἔτερα τέσσαρα (Cod. Chis. τέσσασα) κέρατα κ.τ.λ., cf. also the parallel passage in chap. xi. 4. The corruption is easily explained from v. 5. The sense of v. 8 therefore is—“And the he-goat did exceeding great things, and when he had become strong the great horn was broken, and there arose others, (even) four, in its place, toward the four winds of heaven”.

<sup>1</sup> On this question see Nöldeke's article Ulat in Schenkel's Bibel-Lexikon.

<sup>2</sup> So also in Arabic kabsh “ram” often means “a chief”, “a warrior”.

9—12. With אֲלָיִם before a feminine subject, cf. I Sam. xxv. 27. I Kings xxii. 36. מַעֲשֵׂרָה is generally supposed to mean “from smallness” or “out of smallness”, hence “small” (Von Lengerke). Hitzig considers the מ “redundant”, but none of the passages which he quotes in support of this (II Sam. xiv. 11. Ps. xlvi. 15. Ruth ii. 20) is conclusive. Ewald wishes to read מַעֲשֵׂרָה “shewing smallness” i.e. “appearing small”. Graetz emends the passage by simply striking out the מ, but it is perhaps more probable that we should read קָרְנוֹ אַחֲרָת אֲשֶׁרֶת in accordance with chap. vii. 8 קָרְנוֹ אַפְּרִי יְשֻׁרָּה. The corruption may be due to the almost immediately preceding. For יְשֻׁרָּה the LXX. has καὶ ἐπάταξεν (i.e. וְפָתַח), which at first sight might seem preferable, but the Masoretic reading is confirmed by Is. lvi. 12; hence the ordinary translation “exceedingly” must be retained, cf. יְתִיעָה chap. vii. 7, 19 and Syr. yattir. The little horn waxes great “towards the South, and towards the East, and towards the Glory”. By “the South” is meant Egypt

(see chap. xi. 25), by “the East” Media and Persia, and by הַצְבִּי, “the Glory”, Jerusalem and the Temple, cf. ארן הַצְבִּי chap. xi. 16, 41, xi. 45, and also Ezek. xx. 6. Instead of הַצְבִּי the LXX. has הַצְפָּן, which Graetz adopts, but it has all the appearance of a corruption, since the preceding words might easily lead a scribe to substitute הַצְפָּן for הַצְבִּי, whereas the contrary process would be inexplicable. This verse refers not merely to the foreign conquests of Antiochus, but to the extension of his influence and to the success of his intrigues, cf. chap. xi. 22—24. In v. 10 the relation of Antiochus to the Jews is more clearly defined. Here, as in chap. vii., the heavenly character of Israel, as distinguished from the nations of the earth, is specially emphasized. The “host of heaven” represents the people of God; but the term צבא is here used in a double sense and contains an allusion to the “service” in the Jewish Temple (Numb. iv. 23), as appears from v. 13. The “stars” are not distinguished from “the host of heaven”; the ו in וּמִזְרָכֶת כָּבָבִים is explicative, as in Zech. ix. 9 (Hitzig). By the casting down of some of the stars are meant the cruelties perpetrated at Jerusalem by Antiochus and his agents (I Macc. i. 24, 30), and perhaps there may be a special reference to the deposition and subsequent murder of the high-priest Onias III. (see chap. xi. 22). Verses 11 and 12 are among the most difficult in the whole book, as is shewn by the great disagreement between the commentators. That the text is here very corrupt can scarcely be doubted. The transition from the feminine gender to the masculine (וְהַנְּגִידִי v. 11) would not in itself present any great difficulty, for it might be supposed that the author here drops the metaphor of a horn and speaks of Antiochus in direct terms, but in the second half of v. 12 the feminine gender reappears, although the horn has not again been mentioned—so that the above hypothesis must be abandoned. The idea naturally suggests itself that v. 11 and the first half of v. 12 may be an interpolation, but this notion is contradicted by v. 13. Nor can any help be derived from the LXX., which is here hopelessly confused. Even after we have struck out the obviously interpolated words καὶ ἐρρίφη χαμαὶ ή δικαιοσύνη καὶ ἐποίησε καὶ εὐωδάθη, we cannot recover with any degree of certainty the original text of the translation, still less the Hebrew text which lay before the translator. The following are the principal modern interpretations of the passage. Von Lengerke renders—"Even unto the Prince of the host it exalted itself and took away from him the continual offering, and the place of his sanctuary was given up to destruction, and an host is delivered over together with the continual offering on account of iniquity, and it casteth the truth to the ground and will undertake and carry out with success". It is scarcely necessary to point out the difficulties of this translation—the construing of אֲבָנָה as feminine<sup>1</sup>, the rendering of לְכֵן "together with", etc. Hitzig agrees with Von Lengerke as to v. 11, excepting that he reads וַיַּשְׁלַח (historic Infinitive) instead of וַיַּחַשְׁלַח. In v. 12 he substitutes וַיִּתְשְׁלַח for וַיַּשְׁלַח, and translates, "And a warfare was undertaken against the daily sacrifice with iniquity (Und zu Felde gezogen ward wider das tägliche Opfer mit Frevel), and the truth was cast down to the ground, and it (i.e. the horn) accomplished this, and made it to prosper". Ewald in v. 11 follows the Keri, i.e. "from him the daily sacrifice was taken away". In v. 12 he has, "And armed force is imposed upon the daily sacrifice through iniquity (Und Heerzwang wird auf das Tagtägliche durch Frevel gelegt)" etc. It will be observed that Hitzig and Ewald agree in attributing to צבָא in v. 12 a sense altogether different from that which it bears in v. 11. Thus it appears that the passage, in its present form does not admit of a satisfactory rendering, and since no plausible emendation has, so far as I am aware, been suggested, we can conclude only, from what follows, that vv. 11 and 12 contained some allusion to the cessation of the daily sacrifice and to the pollution of the Temple with heathen rites. Beyond this all is mere conjecture.

13, 14. The vision properly so called is followed by a dialogue between two angels. Daniel has already seen that the daily sacrifice is to be suspended, and he naturally desires to know how long the period of desolation will last. The question however is not uttered by Daniel himself but by an angel—an idea which was possibly suggested to the author by Zech. i. 12. With אָנֹךְ (in some MSS. אָנֹמֶךְ) cf. אָנֹךְ I Kings xix. 20 and אָנֹשֶׁךְ Is. xxvii. 4; Olshausen regards these forms as scribal errors, for in each case the original vowel of the second syllable must have been ā (Lehrbuch der hebräischen Sprache, p. 122). On the phrase אָנֹךְ קָרָא see p. 30, and for the repetition of אָנֹךְ in the sense of “one” and “other” see Exod. xvii. 12. Jer. xxiv. 2. The LXX. presupposes אָנֹךְ both in the former and the latter clause—but this is no doubt an error. פָּלָמָנוּ is absolutely unknown elsewhere, and is taken by all moderns as a contraction of פָּלָי אַלְמָנִי. So Symmachus has τινί ποτε, whereas the LXX., Theodotion and the Peshitta, not understanding the word, simply transcribe it, as though it were a proper name. The intentionally vague phrase “some one or other who spake” seems to be used in order to indicate that the angel was invisible to Daniel. What the first speaker said is not told us; the second asks a question which in the Masoretic text presents great difficulties. Von Lengerke translates, “For how long is the vision—the continual offering and the desolating iniquity—the treading down both of the sanctuary and the host?” Not to mention the wholly unparalleled construction חַת וְקָרֵשׁ וְצָבָא מְרֻמָּס¹ (which, as the accents shew, was intended by the Masoretes), Von Lengerke’s rendering is open to the objection that, if the question refers, as doubtless it does, to the suspension of the daily sacrifice, the speaker is here made to express himself in as awkward and obscure a manner as can be imagined. Hitzig prefers to connect חַת with what precedes, and translates “For how long is the vision of the daily sacrifice—to leave unchecked the horrible iniquity and to trample down sanctuary and host?” (Bis wie lange das Gesicht vom täglichen Opfer? den entsetzlichen Frevel gewähren zu lassen, und Heilithum und Heer zertragen?)” Whether this interpretation removes the difficulty may well be doubted, for not only is the placing of חַת after its object without analogy, but the meaning “gewähren lassen” is altogether unproved. Under these circumstances it is impossible to believe the text to be correct. On the whole, the least improbable solution may perhaps be as follows. The LXX. has, “Ἐώς τίνος τὸ ὄραμα στήσεται καὶ ἡ θυσία ἡ ἀρθεῖσα καὶ ἡ ἀμαρτία ἐρημώσεως ἡ δοθεῖσα, καὶ τὰ ἄγια ἐρημωθήσεται εἰς καταπάτημα ; here στήσεται was probably added as a gloss by the translator or by a later copyist, but the words ἡ ἀρθεῖσα, as Graetz observes, cannot be so explained and imply some additional word in the Hebrew. Graetz suggests חַזְרֶם; it is however more natural to postulate מִרְמָה, for the presence of a participle after תִּקְרֵב would account for the rendering of מִתְחַדֵּשׁ by ἡ δοθεῖσα. To the article in ἡ ἀρθεῖσα and ἡ δοθεῖσα no importance can be attached, for it has been already shewn that the translator added the article in a perfectly arbitrary fashion (p. 51). For זָכָא he appears to have read זָכָב, as also in v. 12 [11]—but this is no doubt an error. The Hebrew basis of the LXX. may therefore have been—

<sup>1</sup> Isaiah xl. 2 proves nothing as to the gender of אֲבָנָה, for מלֹאה צבָא, for probably means "she hath finished her warfare" (i.e. מְלֹאת, cf. Gen. xxix. 27, 28). The Masoretes, who pronounced

מלֹאה, evidently understood the words as "she is filled with her host"—the Targum has אֲרִיעַתְּרָא דְתִימָלִי מְעַם גְּלוּתָהּ.

<sup>1</sup> Hävernick endeavours to defend this by citing Ps. lxxvi. 7 and Jer. xxxii. 20, but neither passage is conclusive.

עֲרָמִתְיָהוּ וּנְהַתְּמִיד מִרְמָה הַפְּשָׁע שְׂמָחוֹת קָרְדָּשׁ וְצָבָא מִרְמָה :

which may be read—

עַד מָתֵי הַחֹזֹן הַתְּמִיד מִרְמָה וְהַפְּשָׁע שְׁם מִתְחַדֵּשׁ קָרְדָּשׁ וְצָבָא מִרְמָה :

i.e. “For how long is the vision to be, while the daily sacrifice is taken away, and the Iniquity set up—from the time when he shall tread down the sanctuary and the service?” In this case התמיד מירם והפשע שם is a circumstantial clause descriptive of the period which begins with the treading down of the sanctuary. The angel asks how long this period will continue. The “iniquity” which stands in opposition to the daily sacrifice must be identical with the “abomination” of chaps. xi. 31; xii. 11. For the Passive Participle שם, see Num. xxiv. 21. Obad. 4. The verb שם is the very word used of the setting up of heathen altars in Jer. xi. 13, cf. also Jer. vii. 30; xxxii. 34. In chaps. xi. 31; xii. 11 the author of Daniel uses the verb נתן in this connection, but שם and נתן are often employed interchangeably by Old Testament writers, even in the same context (Deut. vii. 15. Is. xli. 19; xlivi. 16, 19. Jer. vi. 8; ix. 10. Ezek. xxv. 13; xxxv. 4). That in these passages of Daniel the verb should vary, would be no more astonishing than that we find עַלְפָה in one passage and שָׁמַע in the two others. In this verse both the Masoretes and the LXX. translator have been guided by the desire of assimilating the expression to that used in chaps. xi. 31; xii. 11, but in both cases the assimilation has involved a syntactical anomaly. Verse 14 contains the answer to the angel's question, and לִי is therefore altogether inappropriate. The LXX., Theodotion, and the Pĕshîttâ all read יְהֹוָה, which Ewald, Hitzig, and most modern commentators accept as correct. The phrase שָׁרֵב בְּנֵר must be explained according to v. 26. Consequently it is not, as Von Lengerke and others have supposed, a period of 24 hours (Gr. νυχθήμερον), but is equivalent to עֶרֶב וּבָקָר “successive evenings and mornings” (so Ewald, Hitzig, Kuenen, and Cornill), cf. Gen. viii. 22. Since it is a question of the suspension of the daily sacrifice, the verse alludes, no doubt, to the evening oblation (chap. ix. 21) and the morning oblation (Exod. xxix. 41). וְנִצְדַּק קָרְשׁ “and then the sanctuary shall be justified”; the Niphal נִצְדַּק, which is used nowhere else, seems to mean properly “to prove oneself just” and hence “to be manifested as just”, cf. יְקָרֵשׁ “to shew oneself as holy” (Lev. xxii. 32. Ezek. xx. 41). The justification of the sanctuary is the vindication of its cause, for as long as it is polluted it lies under condemnation. The vagueness of the words וְנִצְדַּק קָרְשׁ certainly appears to confirm the view of those who hold that when the author wrote the event had not taken place.

15—18. As in chap. vii., an interpretation of the vision is supplied by an angel. בִּין does not necessarily imply a prayer to God, but is equivalent to אֶבֶן (chap. vii. 19). The word בָּבֶר is evidently used with reference to the name קָרְאֵל (v. 16) “a human voice”, i.e. a voice speaking in human language. בּין אֹலֵי “between (the two banks of the) Urai”—a somewhat strange ellipse; for the idea cf. chap. xii. 6. גָּבְרִיאֵל (Man of God), who among the later Jews was reckoned one of the archangels, appears here for the first time. It is well known that no names of angels are mentioned in any Jewish writing older than the book of Daniel<sup>1</sup>, whereas works of the period

<sup>1</sup> The ancient Israelites, as Ewald observes (Lehre der Bibel von Gott, II. 288), assumed as a matter of course that an angel had no individual name, immediately following, above all the book of Enoch, contain a highly developed angelology. To what influences this was due cannot, of course, be here discussed. הַלְׁךְ, the shortened form of הַלְׁכָה (which occurs only in Gen. xxiv. 65; xxxvii. 19), is the etymological equivalent of the Arabic relative pronoun الَّذِي, shortened from the far commoner الَّذِي أَنْتَ. Elsewhere הַלְׁךְ, הַלְׁכָה, and the feminine הַלְׁכָה (Ezek. xxxvi. 35) are always appended to a determined noun (as is the case with הַבָּהָר, הַהָּאָה etc.), except in I Sam. xiv. 1, where הַלְׁךְ has the adverbial sense “there”. For the construction of בְּ with לְ cf. chap. xi. 33. The terror with which Daniel is seized at the approach of Gabriel (v. 17) seems at first inconsistent with chap. vii. 16, but may be ascribed to the fact that Gabriel is no ordinary angel. Daniel is addressed as מְאֵנֶךָ, a phrase presumably suggested by the book of Ezekiel; he is bidden to mark well, “for the vision is for the time of the end”, i.e. it refers to the final crisis of the world’s history, and is therefore worthy of peculiar attention. Unless we are prepared to deny that the chapter refers to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, this verse clearly shews that to the author the time of Antiochus was “the time of the end”, or, in other words, that the Divine Kingdom was then to be established<sup>1</sup>. In v. 18 Daniel, who was already prostrate, loses consciousness on hearing the angelic voice, cf. the parallel passage chap. x. 9. The phrase עַל עֲמֹד (cf. chap. x. 11) after the verb עִמָּךְ is peculiar to the post-exilic style (Neh. xiii. 11. II Chron. xxx. 16; xxxiv. 31 etc.); an older writer would here use פָּרָשְׁתָּ (cf. I Sam. xiv. 9).

19—25. The interpretation of the vision is now given. The angel informs Daniel of what will take place “in the last days of wrath”, i.e. at the end of the heathen domination, for the period of the subjection of Israel to the Gentiles is the period of the divine wrath (chap. xi. 36). פִּי לְמַוְעֵד גָּז “because i.e. he was merely one of a class (Gen. xxxii. 30), or else that his name was unutterable (Judges xiii. 18).

<sup>1</sup> Hävernick, who is forced to admit that “the little horn” of chap. viii. is Antiochus, endeavours to save his theory of the book of Daniel by explaining that “the time of the end” means only “one of the most important periods in the history of Israel”!

(it is) for the time of the end"; cf. vv. 17, 26, and chap. x. 14. שָׁמֵר קְצֻן and מִזְרָח are identical terms, since נָעַ bears much the same relation to that שָׁמֶן bears to מִזְבֵּחַ (cf. Ps. lxviii. 17; cxxxii. 13)<sup>1</sup>. Verse 20 explains that the ram represents the "kings", i.e. the empires, of the Medes and Persians, cf. chap. vii. 17 where the Four Empires are called "four kings". In v. 21 "king" is used in both senses; the he-goat is the "empire" of the Greeks, and the great horn is the first "king". הַשְׂפִיר is scarcely an epithet ("hairy"), but a synonym of אֲשָׁרָה, added by way of explanation. הַשְׁבָרָה (v. 22) is a Nominativus pendens, "and as for the horn that was broken, so that four arose in its place" etc. On the peculiar form מְלֹכִיּוֹת see p. 30. Instead of מְגֹוֹן we should perhaps read מְגֹוֹיָה, with Graetz, though the reading of the LXX. τοῦ ἔθνους αὐτοῦ proves very little; the conjecture is supported by what follows, לֹא בָּבוֹן, where the suffix obviously refers to Alexander (cf. ch. xi. 4). The form שְׂמִרָה is rather to be regarded as an Aramaism than as a survival of primitive Hebrew inflection—the only cases apparently analogous are Gen. xxx. 38. I Sam. vi. 12. The "four kingdoms", which in v. 8 and chap. xi. 4 correspond to the four winds, are, according to Porphyry, Macedonia, Syria, Asia, and Egypt—according to Von Lengerke, Hitzig and others, Thrace (North), Egypt (South), Syria (East), and Macedonia (West). But since in chap. xi. the Seleucidae are called kings of the North, not kings of the East, it is perhaps more probable that chap. viii. 22 refers to Syria, Egypt, Parthia, and Macedonia; of the two latter, with which the Palestinian Jews never came directly in contact, the author may have had but a vague knowledge, so that we need find no difficulty in the fact that the Parthian kingdom was formed long after the other three. In v. 23 the phrase גַּם־הַמְּשֻׁנְתִים is rendered by Von Lengerke and Hitzig, "when the sinners fill up their measure". By "the sinners" are meant the heathen oppressors. The LXX., Theodotion, and the Peshitta read "the sins" (סְפָעִים), and this has been accepted by Ewald, on account of chap. ix. 24. But if the author had meant "when the sins have come to the full”, he would presumably have said קָהֵם הַפְשָׁעִים (cf. Is. xviii. 5). The objection which has sometimes been raised (e.g. by Meinhold) that the full measure of sin was not reached until after Antiochus had arisen, is hardly cogent, for the reign of Antiochus is obviously included in the אֲמֹרֶת הַפְשָׁעִים, and all that the author intends, by inserting the words כְּהָתָם הַפְשָׁעִים, is to designate the latter days of Greek supremacy as the worst. “A king insolent and skilled in double-dealing”—חִידּוֹת has here a more general sense than “dark sayings”, and means much the same as תְּלִקְלִקּוֹת in chap. xi. 21. Verse 24 contains several difficulties. וְלֹא בְּכַחּוּ signifies, according to Hävernick and others, “not by his own power, but by the permission of God”. Von Lengerke more naturally explains “not by his strength, but by his intrigues” (cf. chap. xi. 23 וְלֹא בְּעַצְמָתוֹ), פָּנָן being used in a double sense. Very improbable is Ewald’s interpretation, according to which the suffix in לְחוּ refers to Alexander the Great. Perhaps וְלֹא בְּכַחּוּ in v. 24 has been wrongly introduced from v. 22; in any case, if we strike out these words the sense is in no wise impaired. וְנִפְלָאוֹת יִשְׁחַת is rendered by almost all commentators, “and he shall destroy wonderfully”; in support of this Job xxxvii. 5 is quoted, but from such a passage no safe conclusion can be drawn. Graetz admits that this is suspicious, but suggests no emendation. I venture to propose instead וְנִפְלָאוֹת יִשְׁחַח “and he shall utter monstrous things” (cf. יִדְבֶּר נִפְלָאוֹת chap. xi. 36). The verb שָׁחַח is almost entirely confined to the poetical style, but the borrowing of poetical words is, as we have seen, characteristic of Daniel. The latter part of v. 24 must be discussed in connection with v. 25, which is usually translated “and through his cunning he shall cause fraud to prosper in his hand” etc.—contrary to all syntax. Graetz, following the LXX., reads שְׁבָלוֹ עַל קְרָשִׁים which we may safely accept. It has already been suggested (p. 53), in discussing the LXX. text of this passage, that the last words of v. 24 שְׁבָלוֹ עַל קְרָשִׁים are an interpolation occasioned by the beginning of v. 25. This view is confirmed by an examination of the context. We should scarcely be told first that Antiochus “destroyed the people of the saints”, and afterwards that “his mind was against them”. Accordingly it appears that by the “many” (עִצּוֹמִים) in v. 24 we are to understand, not the Jews, but the political enemies of Antiochus, who, being a usurper, naturally had many opponents among the upper classes (see chap. xi. 22—24). It was not until he had firmly established himself on the throne that his hatred of the Jewish religion began to shew itself. Thus the author, having described in v. 24 the political successes of Antiochus, passes on, in v. 25, to describe the king’s contest against Judaism, and fittingly introduces the subject with the words וְעַל קָרְשִׁים שְׁבָלוּ “and against the Saints shall his mind be”, cf. וְלֹבֶבּוּ עַל־בְּרִית קָרְשׁ chap. xi. 28. בְּלֹבֶבּוּ גָּדוֹל is usually explained as “he shall be proud”, but it is rather, “he shall devise great things”; the Hiphil expresses the idea of producing something great, whether in the way of deeds or thoughts. The destroying of many “unawares” perhaps refers to the treacherous attack upon Jerusalem described in I Macc. i. 30; for the phrase בְּשָׁלֵחָה see p. 31. The “Prince of princes” is God, cf. chap. ii. 47. “Without hand” means, of course, “not by human means, but by a special divine intervention”, cf. chap. ii. 34.

<sup>1</sup> I here assume that Delitzsch is right in connecting נָעַ with יָעַ. Others have derived נָעַ from שְׁנָה or even from גַּנָּה.

26, 27. The angel ends his speech with a solemn assertion of the truth of “the vision concerning the evening and the morning”, i.e. concerning the daily sacrifice (v. 14). Here for the first time Daniel is commanded “to hide the vision”, see chap. xii. 4; the author of the book evidently intends by these words to explain how the revelation made to Daniel had remained hidden until the times of Antiochus Epiphanes. The ellipse in נִהִיתִי and the following יְהִי are precisely like that in v. 19. In v. 27 נִהִיתִי is ignored by the LXX.; if the Masoretic text be correct, it means “I came to an end” (cf. chap. ii. 1), i.e. “I was exhausted”, but it must be admitted that nowhere else is נִהִיתִ so used. The Peshitta has zā'ēth “I trembled”—evidently a guess. The words וְאֵין מְבִין “and there was none who understood”, do not, of course, imply that Daniel communicated the vision to others, but the phrase must be taken as signifying “and (I was) no understander (thereof)”; see what has been said on וְאֵין נָבִין in v. 5, and for the idea cf. chap. xii. 8.

CHAPTER IX.

The two last visions of Daniel (chaps. ix—xii) differ from the preceding ones in that the events of history are no longer exhibited in the symbolical form of beasts, horns, etc., but are communicated to Daniel in direct terms. The vision in chap. ix. is dated from the first year of Darius, and is introduced by a long preface. The text of v. 2, interpreted in its most obvious sense, informs us that Daniel “understood by the Scriptures” the prediction of the prophet Jeremiah, according to which the desolation of Jerusalem was to last 70 years. Thereupon Daniel confesses before God the sins of Israel, acknowledges the justice of their punishment, and implores mercy. Whilst he is praying, the angel Gabriel appears with the announcement that 70 weeks are decreed for Israel, and that at the end of that period the sins of Daniel’s people will be pardoned for ever.

This vision has been a subject of controversy, from a very early time, both among Jews and Christians. Ecclesiastical writers of the 3rd century differ widely from one another on the subject, and even so late as the time of Jerome there was no interpretation generally accepted in the Church. Similar disagreement prevailed among the medieval Rabbins, and in modern times the methods devised for solving the problem have been innumerable. To pass in review all the rival interpretations is therefore impossible; the utmost that can be attempted is to make a general classification, giving specimens of the principal types.

The main points to be discussed are (1) What is meant by a week? and (2) What events form the starting-point and the conclusion of the series?

As to the first of these questions, the great majority of interpreters, whether Jewish or Christian, ancient or modern, have held that a “week” is a period of seven years. Some early Christians, however, according to Eusebius (Demonstr. Evang. VIII.), explained the last week as a period of seventy years, while admitting that the other sixty-nine weeks were periods of seven years only. To this very arbitrary assumption they were led solely by the desire of making the 70th week cover the time between the Crucifixion of Christ and the reign of Trajan. A notion still more extravagant has in modern times been defended by Kliefoth, Keil, and others. According to these writers the "weeks" are "symbolical" "heavenly" or in plain language unknown periods, and Keil proceeds to assure us that the incomprehensibility of the revelation is a striking proof of its divine origin<sup>1</sup>. Every other interpretation, it seems, does violence to the text; this alone satisfies all the conditions of the problem. But in reality, this theory is more obviously at variance with the text than any other that has been proposed. Verses 22, 23, and 25, certainly imply that the duration of the weeks was definitely known; indeed, save upon this assumption, the speech of the angel would be, from beginning to end, a piece of elaborate mockery.

Very much greater is the difference of opinion as to the beginning and end of the 70 weeks. On this subject no pre-Christian interpretation has been handed down to us, for to argue, with Hitzig and others, that the LXX. translator regarded the 70 weeks as coming to an end in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, is unsafe, owing to the confused state of the Greek text in this passage. According to Jerome, the Jews of his age made the 70 weeks to begin with the date of the vision, i.e. the first year of Darius the Mede, and to end with the destruction of Jerusalem by Hadrian. The medieval Jews, on the other hand, usually reckoned the weeks from the destruction of the First Temple to the destruction of the Second, under Titus, the chronologischen Zeitmaassen vorausverkündigt, nicht das Geringste von ihrem Offenbarungscharakter, sondern erweist dadurch erst recht ihren göttlichen über menschliches Meinen und Denken erhabenen Ursprung". Keil, Commentar, p. 332.

<sup>1</sup> Lest it should be suspected that I have here exaggerated the absurdity of Keil's theory, I will cite his own words. "Die Weissagung verliert dadurch, dass sie die Entwicklungszeiten der zukünftigen Vollendung des Gottesreichs und dieser Welt nach symbolischen nicht nach irdisch-

first 7 weeks being the period of the Exile and the “Anointed One” of v. 25 being Cyrus<sup>1</sup>. But Ben Ezra, while admitting that the 70 weeks end with Titus, makes them to begin with the date of the vision, the first seven weeks extending as far as Nehemiah, who is the “Anointed One”.

Early Christian theologians naturally endeavoured to find in the passage a prediction of Christ, but the great discordance between them sufficiently proves the difficulty of the task which they undertook.

According to Julius Africanus (ap. Euseb.), the 70 weeks begin with the decree of Artaxerxes, in the 20th year of his reign (Neh. ii. 1—9), and end with the Crucifixion of Christ in the 15th year of Tiberius. But as this amounts to 475 years only, instead of 490, which is the number required, Julius Africanus attempts to get over the difficulty by saying that we are to count by lunar, not by solar, years.

Hippolytus differs from Julius Africanus in that he recognizes a meaning in the division of the 70 weeks into  $7 + 62 + 1$ . He makes the 7 weeks to extend from the date of Daniel’s vision to the Return of the Exiles under Joshua the high-priest, Ezra, and Zerubbabel (sic), and the 62 weeks from the Return of the Exiles to the birth of Christ. The 70th and last week Hippolytus severs from the rest, and places at the end of the world, in the time of the Antichrist (see the fragments of Hippolytus’ Commentary on Daniel, in Migne’s Patrologia Graeco-Latina, Vol. x, and also Das neu entdeckte vierte Buch des Daniel-Kommentars von Hippolytus, ed. Bratke, Bonn, 1891).

Eusebius (Demonstr. Evang. VIII.) dates the 7 weeks from the Return of the Exiles in the 1st year of Cyrus to the completion of the Temple and the surrounding buildings in the 9th year of Darius Hystaspis<sup>2</sup>. The 62 weeks he makes to extend from the time of Darius to the taking of Jerusalem by Pompey, in 63 B.C. He explains the “Anointed One” as a collective term, referring to the Jewish high-priests from Joshua son of of 49 years, whereas it amounted in reality to 26 only (from 538 to 512 B.C.).

<sup>1</sup> So Saadia the Gaon (cited by Ben Ezra), and Rashi.

<sup>2</sup> This Eusebius reckons as a period

Jozadak to Alexander (Yannai), whose death (79 B.C.) he places 482 years after the accession of Cyrus<sup>1</sup>. Another view which Eusebius admits to be possible, is that the 70 weeks begin with the second year of Darius and that the 69th week ends with the death of the high-priest Hyrcanus II. (30 B.C.). The 70th week Eusebius, like Hippolytus, detaches from the others; but he does not regard it as still future. It extends, according to him, from the beginning of Christ's public ministry to the middle of the fourth year after the Crucifixion. The causing of the sacrifice and offering to cease (Dan. ix. 27) refers to the fact that upon the death of Christ the services in the Jewish Temple ceased to be recognized by God<sup>2</sup>.

Apollinaris, according to Jerome, maintained that the 70 weeks did not begin till the birth of Christ; in the last week (from 483 to 490 A.D.) Elijah and the Antichrist were to appear. On this theory Jerome sagely remarks, Periculose de incertis profert sententiam.

It will be seen at once that the above patristic interpretations agree in nothing but in the attempt to establish a more or less fanciful conection between the 70 weeks and the rise of Christianity. Not one of them has any claim to be regarded as the interpretation current among the Christians of the Apostolic age, still less as an interpretation derived from a pre-Christian source. Here, as in so many other cases, a "traditional" explanation does not exist. The explanations given by the Rabbins and the Christian Fathers follow no definite system whatsoever, but are merely the random guesses of individuals, the gropings of men who lacked the clue to the book<sup>3</sup>. The endeavour made by modern apologists to obscure the subject by the introduction of dogmatic considerations is therefore alto-

<sup>1</sup> Strictly speaking therefore the 62 weeks (i.e. 484 years) should close at the death of the high-priest Alexander, not at the taking of Jerusalem by Pompey 16 years later.

<sup>2</sup> Some of the details of Eusebius' theory are uncertain, as the Latin translation by Jerome varies considerably from the present Greek text, but any one who compares the two will, I think, admit that the abstract I have given is, in the main, correct.

<sup>3</sup> "Scio de hac quaestione ab eruditissimis viris varie disputatum et unumquemque pro captu ingenii sui dixisse quod senserat". Jerome, Comm. in Dan. cap. ix.

gether futile. If the question is to be decided at all, it must be decided on scientific grounds alone.

The first principle to be laid down for the interpretation of the vision is that it should be studied in close connection with what precedes. The prayer of Daniel and the revelation made to him are indissolubly linked together (v. 23). What then is the principal subject of Daniel's petition? Verse 20 supplies the answer—he prays on behalf of the "holy mountain" of God, that is, Jerusalem and the Temple. Accordingly we have a right to assume that Jerusalem and the Temple are also the subjects of the revelation; any interpretation which makes the speech of Gabriel to turn upon some different topic, must be unhesitatingly rejected. The 70 weeks, we are expressly told, concern, not the world in general, but the people and the holy city of Daniel (v. 24).

Another point to which special notice must be called is that the revelation sent to Daniel is intended "to give him clear understanding" (v. 22), he is to "understand and know" its contents (v. 25). We are therefore bound to suppose that the author of the chapter knew what was meant by a week, and knew from what point the 70 weeks were to be reckoned.

The 70 weeks obviously stand in connection with the 70 years of v. 2. Elsewhere in the Bible the word "week" always means a week of days (Dan. x 2), but that this cannot be the case here is evident, and the idea of weeks of years therefore naturally presents itself. The institution of the sabbatical year proves that the notion of a week of years was quite familiar to the ancient Jews—the word Sabbath being applied indifferently to the 7th day and to the 7th year (Lev. xxv. 2, 4). It has often been noticed that, according to the author of the book of Chronicles, the 70 years of captivity foretold by Jeremiah corresponded to 70 sabbatical years (II Chron. xxxvi. 21 as compared with Lev. xxvi. 34, 35). Moreover if we believe the book of Daniel to have been composed in the Maccabean period, there is yet another reason for the connection between the 70 years and the 70 weeks of years. For, as I have before pointed out, the 2nd verse of this chapter states that the author understood by reading the Scriptures the number of the years fixed for the desolation of Jerusalem according to the prophecy of Jeremiah, i.e. he discovered in the Scriptures something which enabled him rightly to understand Jeremiah's prediction. But to what passage of Scripture does he here refer? Some light is thrown on the question by vv. 11 and 13, where the punishment that has come upon Israel is said to be "written in the law of Moses". All commentators are agreed that Lev. xxvi. 14 ff. is at least one of the passages which the author had in mind. But no one, so far as I am aware, has noticed that the special allusion is to Lev. xxvi. 18, 21, 24, 28, where it is emphatically declared that the Israelites are to be punished seven times for their sins. The 70 weeks become intelligible if we suppose that the author of Daniel combined Jer. xxv. 11; xxix. 10 with Lev. xxvi. 18 ff. The motive is obvious. Since he firmly believed in the infallibility of Jeremiah's prediction, and was at the same time painfully conscious that the prediction, in its literal sense, had received but a very partial fulfilment, it became necessary to seek for some new interpretation. This was supplied by the passage in Leviticus. The 70 years of Jeremiah were to be repeated 7 times, and at the end of the 490th year the long-promised deliverance might be confidently expected. In the exegesis of the later Jews such deductions, formed by artificially combining different passages of Scripture, were extremely common.

If therefore the 70 weeks are merely the 70 years of Jeremiah multiplied by 7, it is clear that the 70 weeks must begin in the time of Jeremiah. The question has often been discussed whether the terminus a quo is the date of Jeremiah's prediction, as is maintained by Hitzig, or the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, as is maintained by Von Lengerke, Ewald, and Schürer. It is probable, as Graetz remarks, that the author of Daniel did not separate these two events in his mind but regarded them as contemporaneous. To the post-exilic Jews what seemed important was the fact that Jeremiah, the prophet of the last days of the Judaean kingdom, had foretold 70 years of desolation. The precise date of the prophecy was immaterial. Accordingly in II Chron. xxxvi. 21 the 70 years are represented as beginning with the destruction of Jerusalem<sup>1</sup>, and there is every reason to suppose that the author of Daniel took the same view.

On the other hand, those modern interpreters who connect the 70 weeks with the coming of Christ naturally endeavour to place the terminus a quo much later. For this purpose two principal theories have been proposed: that of Hengstenberg who dates the 70 weeks from the 20th year of Artaxerxes I., and that of Auberlen who dates them from the 7th year of the same king. In order to make the 490 years end at the time required, Hengstenberg has recourse to the extraordinary assumption that Artaxerxes I. came to the throne in 474 B.C. (so that his 20th year would begin in 455), and discovers, as we might have expected, many wonderful confirmations of this idea. But since it is now admitted by every one that Artaxerxes I. began to reign in 465 or 464 B.C., Hengstenberg's theory has been generally abandoned. With regard to the theory of Auberlen, it is sufficient to remark that it contradicts the text, for how could Daniel be said to "understand the vision", if the terminus a quo, upon which the whole matter depended, were an event that took place some 70 or 80 years after his death? Are we to suppose that on some previous occasion, of which nothing is recorded, the history of the reign of Artaxerxes had been supernaturally revealed to him?

Since therefore the 70 weeks begin with the destruction of Jerusalem, we may proceed to examine the division into  $7 + 62 + 1$ . Great as are the obscurities of the text in some matters of detail, the following facts stand out clearly. The first 7 weeks date from "the going forth of the word" for the building of Jerusalem, and end with the appearance of an Anointed One, a Prince. The 62 weeks end with the cutting off of an Anointed One. The one remaining week is divided into halves—during the latter half "sacrifice and oblation" are suspended. All critical interpreters identify the second half of the last week with the "time, times, and half a time" of chap.

<sup>1</sup> This is quite compatible with the fact that the Chronicler seems to regard the Return of the Exiles under Cyrus as the close of the 70 years

(II Chron. xxxvi. 22). Zechariah, writing circa 519 B.C., evidently thought that the 70 years were only just coming to an end (Zech. i. 12).

vii. 25, so that the middle of this week must coincide with the cessation of the daily sacrifice, by the order of Antiochus, near the close of the year 168 B.C. (see p. 128, note), and the 70th week therefore ends in 164. But here a difficulty arises. From 588 B.C. (the probable date of the destruction of Jerusalem) to 164 there are only 424 years. Of this fact various explanations have been suggested. Ewald imagines that the full sum of 490 years was diminished, owing to an afterthought of the writer, and even goes so far as to maintain that a passage, in which this was stated, has fallen out at the end of the chapter. The theory has, it need hardly be said, found few adherents. Von Lengerke and Hitzig make the 7 weeks to run parallel with the first 7 weeks in the next series (i.e. the 62 weeks), instead of preceding them. But this interpretation, if less fantastic than Ewald's, is at least highly artificial and scarcely reconcileable with the text. Finally, Graf, Nöldeke, and Cornill have given it as their opinion that the author of Daniel, who lived amongst a people very imperfectly acquainted with the chronology of remote ages, followed an incorrect computation. Schürer agrees with this view, and shews that a precisely similar error is found in other Jewish writers; thus Josephus places the reign of Cyrus some 40 or 50 years too early (compare Bell. Jud. vi. 4, 8. Antiq. XIII. 11, 1; xx. 10), while Demetrius, an Egyptian Jew who composed a work on chronology about the end of the 3rd century B.C., places the fall of Samaria (722 B.C.) 573 years before the accession of Ptolemy IV. (222 B.C.)<sup>1</sup>. We cannot suppose that either Demetrius or Josephus was exceptionally ignorant of chronology, and if professed historians could fall into such mistakes, it is absurd to expect superior accuracy in an apocalyptic work such as Daniel. The difficulty of calculating dates in the ancient world was much greater than is usually imagined<sup>2</sup>. Until the establishment of the Seleucid era, in 312 B.C., the Jews had no fixed era whatsoever. Hence the length of the period between the Sāsānian kings, reckoned only 266 years from Alexander the Great to the overthrow of the Parthian dynasty (228 A.D.).

<sup>1</sup> See Schürer, Gesch. d. jüd. Volkes, II. p. 616.

<sup>2</sup> A curious instance of this is seen in the fact that the Persians, under

Cyrus and Alexander could be discovered only by summing up the reigns of the Persian kings, and it may be doubted whether, in the Maccabean age, one Jew in ten thousand was acquainted even with the names and order of these kings, not to mention the length of their reigns, for the study of non-Biblical history was never a part of Jewish education.

It has sometimes been objected that since the author of Daniel recognizes only 4 Persian kings (see chap. xi. 2), and since the existence of the Seleucid era must have enabled him to compute approximately the date of Alexander, he cannot have made the interval between Cyrus and Alexander so great as the above interpretation would require. But this objection proceeds upon the unfounded assumption that all those chronological difficulties which occur to us must have occurred to the author of Daniel.

1—3. On Darius, son of Ahasuerus, see the Introduction to chap. vi. The name אחשורוש was possibly borrowed by the author from Ezra or from Esther, in both of which books it is spelt as in Daniel. But the form originally in use among the Jews was no doubt אחשירש (pron. Aḥashyarsh or Aḥshayarsh), for the native Persian form is Khshayūrshā, and on an Aramaic stele found in Egypt and now preserved at Berlin, the name is written חשיירש (see the Corpus Inscr. Sem. Pt. 2, N°. 122). With ירבות (v. 2) compare Job xxxiii. 13. These forms were regarded by Ewald as shortened from חביבתי and בינותי, but Nöldeke has shewn, in the Z. D. M. G. xxxvii. p. 525 ff., that the dropping of the ה of the Hiphil, where there is no prefix, is impossible in Hebrew<sup>1</sup>. Accordingly בינותי is either a Kal, inflected according to the analogy of the Hiphil and of such forms as סבותי, or else a mere scribal error for בקעה, cf. בקעה Ps. cxxxix. 2. בקעה is rendered by Von Lengerke “I sought to understand the Scriptures”, and by Hitzig “I marked in the Scriptures the number of the years” etc. But if the view suggested on p. 146 be correct, the sense must be “I understood by the Scriptures” etc.—the Scriptures being here the Pentateuch. With the form מלאות cf. Jer. xxv. 12 and מלאת Jer. xxix.

10. Such forms are combinations of the vulgar pronunciation מְלֹתָה, מְלֹתָה, with the etymologically correct מְלֹתָה, מְלֹתָה; see again chap. x. 3. In v. 3 “to seek prayer and supplication” is, of course, to apply oneself to them, cf. Zeph. ii. 3.

4—9. This prayer bears a striking resemblance to those in Neh. i. 5 ff.; ix. 6 ff., and to that in the Book of Baruch i. 15 ff.<sup>1</sup> It is commonly supposed that the author of Daniel copied from Nehemiah. But it is also possible that both writers were merely using current formulae, for the language of devotion is peculiarly liable to flow in traditional grooves, and how often must prayers such as these have been offered up by the devout Israelites during the long ages of Gentile oppression! Daniel here speaks as the representative of his people, and it is remarkable that in the whole prayer there is not a single verse which does not apply at least as well to the days of Antiochus Epiphanes as to the days of the Babylonian Exile. Nowhere does the speaker even hint that he is at a distance from Palestine; in v. 7 the phrase “all Israel, those who are near and those who are afar off in all the lands whither Thou hast driven them”, can scarcely mean anything but “those Jews who are in Palestine and those who are in foreign countries”, the speaker himself belonging to the former of these classes. The expression “our kings”, in v. 8, does not, of course, assume the existence of a Jewish king at the moment, any more than it does in Neh. ix. 32. The speaker is here looking back upon the history of Israel, and he confesses that from of old his people have been transgressors.

10—14. For מִזְבֵּחַ see v. 27 and Jer. xlvi. 18; xliv. 6. II Chron. xii. 7; the same metaphor occurs again in Ps. lxxix. 6 and Rev. xvi. “The curse and the oath which is written in the law of Moses” refers back to v. 2 and, as has before been said, to Lev. xxvi. 18 ff. In v. 12 “judges” is apparently a general term for “rulers” (Amos ii. 3. Ps. ii. 10). Ewald, believing that the author of Daniel copied from Baruch, considers this verse an abbreviated form of Bar. ii. 1, where the word “judges” is evidently used in its special historical sense. For אֲשֶׁר “so that”, in אָשֶׁר לְאַנְעִשָּׂתָה, see I Kings iii. 12. Is. lxv. 16. To the pious Jews the outrages committed by Antiochus at Jerusalem appeared altogether unparalleled, as we can see from the terms, doubtless somewhat hyperbolical, which are employed in I Macc. i. 39, 40; ii. 7—12. In v. 13 the phrase אֵת קָלְחָרֶשֶׁת הַזֹּאת in אֵת is probably due to the preceding passive, בְּתוּב, cf. Num. xxxii. 5. I Kings ii. 21. לִשְׁבַּיל בְּאַקְמַת is rendered by Von Lengerke “to become wise through Thy truth”, and by Hitzig “to have insight into Thy faithfulness (einzusehen deine Treue)”, i.e. to realize that God fulfils His threats; the original meaning of the root שָׁכַל is, of course, “to gaze”, “to contemplate”. With the phrase וְיִשְׁקֹד יְהוָה עַל־הָרֶשֶׁת (v. 14) cf. Jer. i. 12.

<sup>1</sup> Compare especially Dan. ix. 4 with Neh. i. 5 (which again is based upon Deut. vii. 9); Dan. ix. 7, 8 with Bar. i. 15—17; Dan. ix. 12, 13 with Bar. ii. 1, 2; Dan. ix. 14 with Neh. ix. 83. Bar. ii. 9; Dan. ix. 15 with Neh. ix. 10.

15—19. Upon the confession of sin now follows the prayer for deliverance. “And so Thou gatest to Thyself renown as at this day”, i.e. the memory of Thy deeds is still living among us, cf. Ps. xliv. 1 ff. That the recollection of God’s acts in the remote past and, above all, of the Exodus from Egypt, contributed greatly to rouse the enthusiasm of the Jews in the Maccabean age, appears from many indications. In v. 16 אַדְלָתֶךָ (with defective spelling, according to Baer) “Thy righteous acts”, are the works which God has wrought for His people, cf. Judg. v. 11. I Sam. xii. 7. The words “Jerusalem and Thy people are a reproach to all that are round about us” exactly express the position of the faithful Jews under Antiochus, since in addition to the tyranny of the king they had to endure the taunts of their heathen neighbours, the Edemites, the Ammonites, etc. The word שָׁם (v. 17) is chosen with special reference to שָׁמָן (chap. xii. 11), i.e. the heathen altar set up in the Temple. Instead of שָׁמָן אֱלֹהִים? the LXX. has ἐνεκεν τῶν δούλων σου δέσποτα, i.e. לְמַעַן עֲבֹדֵךְ אֱלֹהִים, which gives a decidedly better sense. For though in this prayer the speaker several times passes from the second to the third person without any apparent reason, the words לְמַעַן אֱלֹהִים, following immediately upon a petition, would be very harsh. Nor can it be objected that לְמַעַן עֲבֹדֵךְ is inconsistent with the confession of the utter unworthiness of Israel, for the same phrase occurs in Is. lxiii. 17, a passage of very similar import. The opening words of

v. 18 are almost identical with II Kings xix. 16. Is. xxxvii. 17.

20—23. Though Daniel had already understood the meaning of Jeremiah's prophecy (v. 2), Gabriel appears, before the prayer is ended, to give him fuller and more explicit information. With קָנִישׁ “the man”, as applied to Gabriel, cf. בְּכַרְאָה נָבָר chap. viii. 15 and also Acts i. 10. For בְּתַחַלָּה “previously” see chap. viii. 1. The peculiar phrase מְשֻׁךְ בַּיִשְׁעָה is rendered by Hävernick and Von Lengerke “being caused to hasten with haste”, מְשֻׁךְ being taken as a participle Hophal from שָׁעַם, a verb which elsewhere is used only in the Kal, and which, it must be admitted, never means “to hasten” but “to be weary”. שָׁעַם is a noun of the same form as יְמָרֵן. Theodotion, the Peshitta, and the Vulgate have here “flying”, according to which interpretation שָׁעַם would be from שָׁעַף; but to this there are two objections, firstly that שָׁעַם would then become inexplicable, and secondly that nowhere in the Old Testament are angels represented as flying<sup>1</sup>. Meinhold takes מְשֻׁךְ בַּיִשְׁעָה as referring to Daniel, and translates the clause, “whom I had seen previously, when I was exhausted”, cf. chap. viii. 17, 18. נֶגֶע אֶל “approaching me”, cf. Jon. iii. 6. Job iv. 5. “About the time of the evening oblation”, see Acts iii. 1. The mention of the oblation doubtless refers to the suspension of the daily sacrifice—Daniel is praying for the holy mountain of his God at the hour when, in the usual course of things, the evening oblation would be offered. For וַיַּבְּנֵו (v. 22) “and he instructed (me)”, the LXX. and the Peshitta read וַיַּבְּאֵנָה “and he came”. The phrase לְהַשְׁכִּילךְ בִּינָה apparently signifies, not “to cause thee to understand the meaning of the prophecy” (Von Lengerke), but rather “to give thee clear understanding”—הַבִּנָה being used adverbially, cf. מִלְחָמָה בִּנָה Deut. ii. 9, 24; phrases of this kind form the transition from the use of the abstract verbal noun as the object of the verb (as in וַיַּקְרֵב מִקְדָּשׁ I Sam. xix. 8) to the so-called accusative of manner (as in וַיַּרְא אֶתְכֶם צֹבָה גְּרוּזָה Jer. iii. 15). דבר אֲזַל (v. 23) “a word went forth”, i.e. the divine sentence, which now follows, was uttered. With the term חִמּוֹדֹת, applied to Daniel, we must compare אִישׁ חַמְרוֹת in chap. x. 11, 19; the expression is a peculiar one, for elsewhere חַמְרוֹת is used of things, never of persons (see Dan. x. 3; xi. 38, 43); the only passage in which the verb חָמַד has God as its subject is Ps. lxviii. 17, the object being impersonal. The LXX. has here ὅτι ἐλεεινός εἰ, and ἀνθρωπος ἐλεεινός in chap. x. 11, 19, i.e. the translator read חַסְדִּיּוֹת instead of חַמְרוֹת, for ἐλέος is the most usual rendering of חַסְדָּה. In favour of this reading it might be urged that אֲנָשִׁים חַסְדִּיּוֹת actually occurs in the Palestinian Talmud (Sotāh ix., near the end). But, on the whole, the Masoretic text is here to be preferred, for singular as the expression אִישׁ חַמְרוֹת appears, it may have been suggested by some such phrase as “an object of affection”, cf. בְּרֻכּוֹת “an object of blessings” Ps. xxi. 7. With the use of the fem. plural חַמְרוֹת as “therefore heed the word, and give heed to the vision”; פֵּן is here the Imperat. קָל, of the same form as שָׁם (see what has been said on v. 2), and apparently does not differ in meaning from הָבֵן, cf. רְשָׁמָנוּ v. 15 and v. 5.

<sup>1</sup> Jacob's dream, in Gen. xxviii. 12, obviously assumes that angels are wingless.

24. This verse lays down the fundamental principle, which is afterwards explained in detail. The 70 years foretold by Jeremiah are to be understood as 70 weeks of years, and by the end of this period the redemption of Israel will be complete. It has already been remarked that elsewhere in the Old Testament שְׁבִיעַ always means “a week of days”, here only “a week of years”; in this latter sense it is sometimes used in post-Biblical Hebrew, e.g. in the Mishnah, Sanh. v. 1. Instead of the Pl. שְׁבָעִים, which occurs 6 times in Daniel, other Biblical writers employ שְׁבָעָות (e.g. Exod. xxxiv. 22. Deut. xvi. 9. II Chron. viii. 13). On נִחְפַּךְ “have been decreed”, see p. 30; for the use of the singular form of the verb with a plural subject, cf. Gen. xxxv. 26. Job xxii. 9, in both of which cases the verb has, as here, a passive meaning. The expression “thy people and thy holy city” does not imply, as Jerome imagines, that Israel and Jerusalem are no longer recognized by God, but is used because Daniel represents the true Israel, cf. שְׁבָע chap. xii. 1 and the phrase בֵּית קָרְשָׁנוּ וְתִפְאַרְתָּנוּ Is. lxiv. 10. Von Lengerke rightly observes that the Infinitives which now follow refer, not to the events which take place during the course of the 70 weeks, but to the blessings with which the 70 weeks conclude. לְכָלָה stands for לְכָלּוֹת, as in Jer. xxxviii. 4 מִנְאָה stands for מִרְאָה, owing to the confusion (doubtless the result of Aramaic influence) between roots with final נ and those with final א. Von Lengerke chooses to read לְכָלָה, which he renders “to shut in” (einschliessen); but such a metaphor is very forced. In the word וְלַחֲתָם חֶטְאוֹת (Keri), due to the almost immediately following. Von Lengerke, however, prefers the Kethib “to seal”, although “to seal up sin” elsewhere signifies “to reserve it for punishment” (Job xiv. 17, cf. Deut. xxxii. 34), which cannot be the sense here. Instead of the Kethib חֶטְאוֹת the Masoretes read חֶטְאָה, for the sake of the parallelism, but this is unnecessary (see Micah i. 5). Hitzig translates this passage “to complete the transgression and to fill up the measure of sin” (“zu vollenden den Abfall und zu füllen das Sündenmaass”); it is however more in accordance with the context to understand כלָא and חֶתֶם in the negative sense, i.e. “to make an end of”, “to abolish” (cf. Num. xxv. 11. Ezek. xxii. 15). The versions read as follows—LXX. συντελεσθῆναι τὴν ἀμαρτίαν καὶ τὰς ἀδικίας σπανίσαι (read σφραγίσαι)—Theod. τοῦ συντελεσθῆναι ἀμαρτίαν καὶ τοῦ σφραγίσαι ἀμαρτίας—Aquila, τοῦ συντελέσαι τὴν ἀθεσίαν καὶ τοῦ τελειώσαι ἀμαρτίαν—Pesh. لَعْلَمْ سَتَّة مَلَكُوتْنَى رَتَّبَنَى. The next clause يְלַכֵּר שׁוֹן יְלַכֵּר is, according to the accents, connected with what precedes, but it should rather be coupled with גָּדוֹלָה אֶצְרָק עַלְמִים, for the six acts here enumerated naturally fall into three pairs. The words גָּדוֹלָה and אֶצְרָק are both legal terms, by the “atoning of sin” and the “bringing in of everlasting righteousness” is meant the termination of that controversy or suit (רִיב) which God has with His people (see Is. xxvii. 9). “To seal vision and prophet” is “to confirm” the predictions of the prophets (Von Lengerke, Hitzig), cf., in the New Testament, John iii. 33; vi. 27. The metaphor is taken from the affixing of a seal to a document in order to attest its genuineness (I Kings xxi. 8). The last act is “to anoint the most holy thing”—i.e. to consecrate the Altar in the Temple,

which, when the author wrote, was given up to the heathen worship. Some early Christians and some medieval Jews discovered an allusion to the Messiah in this passage (see the Pěshı̄tā and Ben-Ezra), but the phrase קָרְשִׁים לְקָרֵשׁ, which occurs more than forty times in the Old Testament, never refers to persons, always to things, and is used especially of the Altar of sacrifice (Exod. xxix. 36, 37; xxx. 29; xl. 10).

25—27. וַתִּהְרֹעֶן תְּמִשְׁבֵל is rightly pointed as indicating a command, “and so thou art to know and to understand”. The “word” (דְּבָר) is of course the divine promise uttered by Jeremiah; for the phrase, cf. v. 23 and Is. lv. 11. That the expressions חַשּׂוֹב וּבְנָתָה and לְחַשֵּׁב וּלְבָנוֹת are meant to correspond to one another, is evident. Yet most commentators translate the former “to restore and to build”, and the latter “shall be built again”, taking the verb first in a literal and afterwards in a derived sense (so Ewald). Von Lengerke and Hitzig endeavour to avoid the difficulty by translating “shall be restored”. But it appears much more probable that we should read מְשֻׁבֵּן וּבְנָתָה “to people and to build”, and shall be peopled and built”—cf. Isaiah xliv. 26. Jer. xxx. 18. Ezek. xxxvi. 10, 11, 33. If it be asked why the author says “to people and to build” rather than “to build and to people”, the obvious answer is that the repopulation of Jerusalem necessarily preceded the rebuilding, and as a matter of fact we know from Nehemiah that nearly a century after the First Return most of the city was still in ruins (Neh. vii. 4). By the most modern interpreters (Von Lengerke, Hitzig, Schürer, Cornill) understand Cyrus, on account of Is. xlv. 1. Graetz however, agreeing with Eusebius, explains it as referring to the line of Jewish high-priests. This view appears to be supported by the following considerations. Firstly in v. 26 and in ch. xi. 22 the words מֶשֶׁנָּה and נְגִיד certainly seem to designate the High-Priest. Secondly, if the author were referring to Cyrus, he would surely not content himself with saying “till an Anointed One, a Prince”, but would add something to indicate that this Anointed One was the liberator of the Jewish exiles. That the term מֶשֶׁנָּה may be applied to the High Priest is shewn by Lev. iv. 3, 5, 16; vi. 15, and with regard to נְגִיד Graetz has observed that it exactly corresponds to προστάτης, προστασία, used of the High Priest in his civil capacity (Ecclesiasticus xlv. 24. Josephus, Antiq. XII. 4. 2)<sup>1</sup>. It appears therefore that the first 7 weeks end with the reestablishment of the Jewish worship under Joshua son of Jozadak (Ezra iii. 2), who bore the title of High Priest even before the completion of the new Temple (Haggai i. 1. Zech. iii. 1). From that time till the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes there was always a מִשְׁחָה נֶגֶד at Jerusalem, and the city continued to be “peopled and builded”. But what is meant by רחוב וחרוץ ? Von Lengerke disconnects these two words and considers רחוב to be the subject of the preceding verbs ; he therefore renders, “And as for 62 weeks—the street (or, public place) shall be restored and built” etc. Others, following the Masoretic accentuation, take רחוב וחרוץ as a single phrase, and suppose that the subject of the preceding verbs is Jerusalem (so Hitzig). חוץ is explained by Von Lengerke as “that which is determined”, on account of נִמְרָצָה in vv. 26, 27 ; his rendering “and it is determined, but in distress of times”—is, however, quite impossible. Most recent interpreters (Ewald, Cornill and others) make חוץ to mean “trench” or “moat”, and in proof of this the term חוץ is cited, which occurs in the Mishnah (e.g. Kil'ayim II. 8 ; v. 3) and the Talmud. But it there seems to be used only of “ditches” (in fields or gardens), never of “trenches” for purposes of fortification. And why should “trenches” be mentioned here, for elsewhere we read of “walls” or “towers” as the bulwarks of Jerusalem ? A city built on such uneven ground can be but very imperfectly defended by moats. Moreover the coupling together of רחוב וחרוץ “public places and trenches” would be very strange. Hitzig translates “nach Strasse und Hof”, but for this rendering of חוץ there is no authority. The renderings of the LXX. (εἰς πλάτος καὶ μῆκος) and of Theodotion (πλατεία καὶ τεῖχος) seem to be mere guesses. Graetz proposes רחוב וחרוץ “with public places and walls”, and thinks that this was the reading which lay before Theodotion. But neither in Ezek. xiii. 10, the only other passage in the Old Testament where the word occurs, nor yet in post-Biblical Hebrew, so far as Graetz has shewn, does ציון signify the wall of a city, as the context would here require. Perhaps we should read רחוב וחוין “with public places and streets”, Pesh. כתובות ג עמלת, cf. Jer. v. 1. For the construction of והשׁמים התקררו עבִים ורַוִים רחוב וחוין as an adverbial phrase, cf. I Kings xviii. 45. Instead of ובצוק the LXX. has καὶ κατὰ συντέλειαν καὶ ρῶν and the Peshittā, לעת ותקרא, i.e. גבקין העתים. That the Peshittā has here been influenced by the LXX. is improbable. The difficulties of the Masoretic reading are obvious, for, not to mention the fact that פז occurs nowhere else, the notion of “troublous times” would surely be expressed, as Graetz remarks, by “times of trouble” not “trouble of times” (cf. שׁתְּתָה בְּצָרָה chap. xii. 1, Ps. ix. 10; x. 1 and similar expressions). Such a phrase as זעקה העתים is altogether without analogy. Moreover the ו before בזוק seems to indicate that here a fresh clause begins; the rendering “even in troublous times” is extremely forced—the Peshittā, feeling this difficulty, ignores the ו altogether. I therefore venture to think, with Graetz, that the words in question should be connected with what follows. Whether we should strike out the ו in ואחרי (v. 26), as Graetz proposes, or whether we should regard the words ואחרי והשׁבים נשפטו ונשננים as an interpolated gloss, is doubtful; in either case the sense remains the same. יברחת מושית “an Anointed One shall be cut off”, refers, according to Von Lengerke, to the death of Seleucus Philopator (175 B.C.). Hitzig and others explain it as an allusion to the deposition of the High Priest Onias III., which took place early in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. This latter view appears decidedly the more probable (see chap. xi. 22). The words which follow, לו אין, are very uncertain. The renderings which have been proposed “but not for himself”, “and he shall have nothing (or no one)”, “and he shall cease to be”—all present grave syntactical difficulties. The idea naturally suggests itself that we should read ואינני “and he shall be no longer”, but it is more likely that some word or words have fallen out. Graetz wishes to read ואין עאר לו as in chap. xi. 45; since however the latter passage refers to the death of Antiochus, not to the death of Onias III., the emendation is hardly probable. The latter half of v. 26 and the whole of v. 27 are involved in such extraordinary difficulties that hardly any two interpreters take the same view. Any attempt to construe or emend the passage must be regarded as purely conjectural. As it is impossible to discuss the innumerable suggestions that have been made, I must confine myself to points of special importance. Von Lengerke, following the Masoretic text, translates, “and the city and the sanctuary shall be devastated by the people of a prince, who cometh and in the flood (shall be) his end, and till the end (shall be) war and a decree of desolations” (“und die Stadt und das Heilithum wird verwüsten Volk eines Fürsten, welcher kommt und in der Fluth sein Ende, und bis aufs Ende Krieg und Beschluss der Wüsten”). The “prince”, according to Von Lengerke, is Antiochus Epiphanes; after his “people” (i.e. his armies) have ravaged Jerusalem, he is to “come” into Persia, and then “his end” will overtake him in the midst of a “flood” (i.e. an armed multitude). Hitzig and Ewald also make this “prince” to be Antiochus, whereas Graetz identifies him with the “Anointed One” who is “cut off”, i.e. the High Priest Onias III. Instead of וְ Graetz reads עַם (according to the LXX., Theod. and the Pěsh.), and he explains the sentence as meaning that the city and sanctuary are to share in the ruin of Onias. For the words הָבֵא וּקְצֹן, Graetz substitutes וּקְצֹן קָדוֹם (with the LXX.) “and his end shall come”. That the “prince” is Antiochus seems improbable from chap. xi. 22, but it is likewise unsafe to identify him with the “Anointed One”, for in that case the author would presumably have said עַם קָנִין. I would therefore suggest, though with the greatest diffidence, that we should read וְהַשְׁעֵר וְהַפְּלֶשֶׁת יִשְׁחַת עַמְגַנִּיד הָבֵא, “and the city and the sanctuary shall go to ruin, together with the prince that shall come (after Onias)”. If נִיר does not refer to a person previously mentioned, the omission of the article is possible (cf. Gen. i. 31. Ps. civ. 18). The “prince” would seem to be Jason, the brother and successor of Onias III., and to him therefore we may refer the suffix in קָדוֹם; his miserable end is described in II Macc. v. 7—10. Since the latter half of v. 26 anticipates the events of the 70th week, as is shewn by the phrase וְיַעֲשֵׂה, we need find no difficulty in the fact that the final overthrow of Jason took place about 170 B.C., i.e. after the 70th week had begun. The metaphor of a "flood", for "destruction", appears again in chap. xi. 22. "And until the end shall be war (and) a sentence of desolations"—זָמֵן here means the end of the time of affliction (cf. chap. viii. 17, 19), and the "war" is that which is being waged by Antiochus against the Saints (chap. vii. 21). נִחְרָצָה is stat. constr. of נִחְרַץ (v. 27 and chap. xi. 36), properly that which is "cut", "decided". For the present "a sentence of desolations" is being executed upon Jerusalem, but the time of deliverance is near. Verse 27 describes the last week, i.e. the period beginning in the year 171 B.C. Von Lengerke translates, "A week shall make a firm covenant with the many, and during half the week he shall abolish sacrifice and oblation, and over the edge of abominations (cometh) the desolator; and (this shall be) till the consummation and (till) the sentence shall be poured out upon the desolator". According to this interpretation, the "covenant" is the conspiracy of the apostate Jews against the religion of Israel; the "edge of abominations" is the Temple defiled by heathen rites, and the "desolator" is Antiochus. Hitzig agrees with Von Lengerke in taking שְׁבֵיעַ אַחֲרָךְ to be the subject of the first clause, but he explains בְּרִית as "make burdensome", and הַנֶּגֶב as the covenant of God with Israel, i.e. for a week those who adhere to the covenant are to be persecuted. Each of these interpretations is open to serious objection. In the first place, to speak of a period of time as "making a covenant", or "rendering a covenant burdensome" would be quite without analogy. Secondly, the meanings here ascribed to הַנֶּגֶב cannot be proved; in the only other passage where the Hiphil of this verb occurs (Ps. xii. 5) it has a totally different sense. Ewald agrees with Von Lengerke as to the meaning of הַנֶּגֶב, though he makes Antiochus, not the week, to be the subject of the verb. Graetz substitutes וְתַעֲשֵׂה for וְתַחֲנֵב, and thinks that the sense is either, "And he (i.e. Antiochus) shall abolish the covenant for the many", or else "And he shall cause the many to transgress the covenant". Whether the words will admit of this latter rendering is extremely doubtful, and, in any case, if Graetz be right in supposing that hitherto

<sup>1</sup> נֶגֶד may also be compared to the Arabic imām (of. נָגֵד = amāma), which is applied both to temporal and spiritual leaders, but especially to the latter.

Antiochus has not been mentioned, it is very unlikely that the verb here refers to him. Perhaps the author may have written וְהַחֲפֵר בְּרִית לְרַבִּים “and the covenant shall be annulled for the many”, i.e. there is to be a period of general apostasy; cf. Jer. xxxiii. 21. The use of a masculine verb with a feminine subject is particularly common when the verb is passive (Judges xvi. 11. Is. xxi. 2. Jer. xxix. 22). The “many” are, of course, the majority of the Jewish people (cf. chap. xi. 33). In the latter half of the verse, the article of הַשְׁבֵעַ shews that it is still a question of the 70th week, not of a subsequent period; thus we are to understand that during the latter half of the 70th week (from 168 to 164 B.C.) “sacrifice and oblation” cease. As it is impossible to discover a subject for the transitive יִשְׁבַּית (unless we take the “prince” of v. 26 to be Antiochus), we should perhaps read וְשָׁבַת. Of the clause וְעַל כָּנָף שָׁקֹצִים מְשׁוּםִם innumerable interpretations have been proposed, besides that of Von Lengerke quoted above, but none of them is even plausible<sup>1</sup>. If the text be sound, it is clear that מְשׁוּםִם (so Baer reads, not מְשֻׁמָּם) must be taken as an epithet of שָׁקֹצִים (see chaps. xi. 31; xii. 11), according to the very rare construction אֶלְגִּים קָשָׁה Is. xix. 4. This at once disposes of all those renderings which make by itself to be the subject of the clause. For וְעַל כָּנָף it has been proposed to read וְעַל כָּנוֹן “and instead thereof” (cf. chap. xi. 20, 21, 38)—an emendation which appears wellnigh certain (see Kuenen, Historisch-critisch Onderzoek, II. p. 472). In this case, the suffix in כָּנוֹן refers to the זְבַח וּמִנְחָה, which, as they together form the daily sacrifice, may be construed as a singular. מְשׁוּםִם may be a corruption of מְשֻׁמִּים or שָׁמְשִׁים “set up”, from שָׂוֵם, of which the Hophal perhaps occurs in Gen. xxiv. 33—see what has been said on chap. viii. 13. In the last clause of v. 27 the phrase קָלָה וּנְחַרְצָה “ruin and sentence (of judgment)” is quoted from Is. x. 23; xxviii. 22. If קָלָה be, as seems natural, the subject of the verb עָפָק, we are almost obliged to read עָרָך (with Bleek), for when עַד introduces a verbal clause, the verb takes precedence of the subject (Gen. xxxviii. 11. Josh. ii. 22. II Sam. x. 5. Prov. vii. 23); a well-known case in which עַד has been wrongly pointed as שָׁזַח is Job i. 18. שׁוֹמֵם, according to Von Lengerke and Ewald, refers to Antiochus, on whom a divine judgment is to be poured out. But to this there are two objections—firstly, that in chap. xii. 11 שׁוֹמֵם refers to the צְדִיקָה, not to Antiochus; secondly, that neither שׁוֹמֵם nor מְשׁוֹמֵם ever means a “desolator”. It is also remarkable, though the difficulty is not an insuperable one, that שׁוֹמֵם has no article. I would venture to propose that for עַל־שׁוֹמֵם we should read עַל־שׁוֹמְם “upon him that set them up” (according to the analogy of בְּנֵי etc.), the suffix referring to the שָׁקָעִים; cf. again chap. viii. 13.

<sup>1</sup> “Die Ausleger”, says Hitzig, “sind hier selbst mit allerhand שָׁקֹצִים in die Wochen gekommen”.

For the convenience of the reader, I here repeat the last four verses of the chapter, emended and translated according to the suggestions made above.

24. Seventy weeks are decreed for thy people and for thy holy city, to make an end of transgression and to do away with sins, to atone for iniquity and to bring in everlasting righteousness, to seal vision and prophet and to anoint the most holy thing.

25. Know therefore and understand (that) from the going forth of the promise to people and to build Jerusalem until an Anointed One, a Prince, (there are) seven weeks, and for sixty and two weeks it (i.e. Jerusalem) shall be peopled and built, (with) public places and streets :

26. And in the end of the times [after the sixty and two weeks] an Anointed One shall be cut off and shall have no..... and the city and the sanctuary shall go to ruin together with the Prince that shall come (after him), and his end (shall be) in a flood (of destruction), and until the end (shall be) war, a sentence of desolations.

27. And the covenant shall be annulled for the many during one week, and during half the week sacrifice and oblation shall cease, and instead thereof (there shall be) abominations set up, and afterwards ruin and a sentence (of judgment) shall be poured out upon him that set them up.

CHAPTERS X—XII.

The fourth of Daniel's visions is, from a historical point of view, by far the most important of all. The whole of chap. x., it is true, is little more than a prologue, but in chap. xi. we find a complete survey of the history from the beginning of the Persian period down to the time of the author. Here, even more than in the earlier visions, we are able to perceive how the account gradually becomes more definite as it approaches the latter part of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes and how it then passes suddenly from the domain of historical facts to that of ideal expectations. Accordingly those interpreters who endeavour to find in the vision allusions to historical events later than the Maccabean period, have had to contend against the greatest difficulties. As it was impossible to deny that the description up to chap. xi. 21 referred to the predecessors of Antiochus Epiphanes, most of the Christian Fathers took refuge in the hypothesis that between v. 20 and v. 21 there is an interval of several centuries, although the opening words of v. 21, "And there shall arise in his place a contemptible man," clearly shew that in the mind of the author there was no interval whatever<sup>1</sup>. Nor have modern apologists been more fortunate. Kliefoth takes the liberty of assuming, without a shadow of proof, that a few thousand years elapse between chap. xi. 35 and what follows. Hävernick asks us to believe that chap. xi. 45 refers to the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, and that the next verse (which begins, "At that time shall Michael stand up") refers to a period still future.

In order to understand the vision it is of the utmost importance to determine, as nearly as possible, the date of its pretatur super personā Antiochi qui cognominatus est Epiphanes... Nostri autem haec omnia de Antichristo prophetari arbitrantur qui ultimo tempore futurus est".

<sup>1</sup> On chap. xi. 21 Jerome remarks "Hucusque ordo historiae sequitur, et inter Porphyrium ac nostros nulla contentio est. Caetera quae sequuntur usque ad finem voluminis, ille inter-

composition, or in other words to discover the exact point at which the description ceases to be historical and becomes ideal. Von Lengerke thinks that the piece was written directly after the death of Antiochus, and that with chap. xii. 1 the author begins to describe his expectations. But there seems reason for believing that the transition takes place earlier, namely in chap. xi. 40. The arguments are briefly as follows. Although it is not certain how many times Antiochus invaded Egypt, one thing is tolerably clear—that in Daniel xi. three invasions only are mentioned, i.e. those in vv. 25—28, in v. 29, and in vv. 40—43. To suppose, with Hitzig and others, that vv. 22—25 refer to an invasion of Egypt, has been shewn by Hoffmann to be altogether illegitimate (Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, pp. 94—96). Both Hoffmann and Schürer (Gesch. d. jüd. Volkes, I. p. 130) are of opinion that the first Egyptian campaign took place in the summer of 170 B.C. This is no doubt the campaign described in Dan. xi. 25—28 and I Macc. i. 17—19<sup>1</sup>. Antiochus seems to have invaded Egypt again in 169 B.C., but the fact is not mentioned in Daniel, for the invasion spoken of in chap. xi. 29 must be that of the year 168 B.C. After this, it would appear, Antiochus never attacked Egypt again. We are thus led, with Cornill, to regard the invasion described in Dan. xi. 40—43 as one which the author expected but which never actually took place. The hypothesis of Von Lengerke and Hitzig that in v. 40 the author suddenly goes back to describe events anterior to 168 B.C., does violence to the plain sense of the text. But a difficulty still remains. Porphyry, quoted by Jerome, states that in the 11th year of his reign (i.e. in 165 B.C.) Antiochus again made war upon Egypt, and explains Dan. xi. 40—43 as referring to this campaign<sup>2</sup>. Several modern interpreters, e.g. Hävernick and Hoffmann, have accepted Porphyry's explanation. It is, however, quite incredible that the author of Daniel is here describing facts. A conquest of Egypt such as we read of in this passage, could not have been passed over in silence by all the historians, for Egypt was at that time under Roman protection and an attack upon the country must therefore have at once produced a war with Rome. Nor can we suppose the campaign here described to have been so short that the Romans had no time to interfere. The text implies that it is of considerable duration, for not only is all Egypt at the feet of Antiochus but even the more distant Libyans and Ethiopians make their submission to him. It is a still more fatal objection to Porphyry's interpretation that it entirely contradicts what we know about Antiochus himself at this period. Nothing is more certain than that this king at the end of his reign—far from "having power over the treasures of gold and silver and all the riches of Egypt"—was reduced to great financial distress. We are therefore forced to conclude that Porphyry was here in error. Whether the mention of the "eleventh year" is due simply to the fact that Antiochus reigned eleven years, so that any event which was believed to have occurred at the end of his reign would naturally be placed in his eleventh year, or whether Porphyry has confounded the eleventh year of Antiochus with the eleventh year of Ptolemy Philometor (i.e. 170 B.C.), I do not venture to determine. In any case no historical argument can be built upon Porphyry's treatment of this passage, for it is evident (as Meinhold has observed) that when he describes Antiochus as pitching his tent "in the place called Apedno between the Tigris and the Euphrates", the narrative is based upon nothing but a false interpretation of Dan. xi. 45.

<sup>1</sup> In II Macc. v. 1 this campaign is called "the second", but the statement is probably erroneous.

<sup>2</sup> On Dan. xi. 40, 41, Jerome says,

"Et haec Porphyrius ad Antiochum refert: quod undecimo anno regni sui rursus contra sororis filium Ptolemaeum Philometorem dimicaverit".

If the above reasoning be valid, these three chapters must have been composed before the death of Antiochus. Indeed it appears well-nigh certain that they were composed more than a year before his death, for they mention neither the great victories of Judas Maccabaeus nor the recovery and reconsecration of the Temple. The deliverance predicted in chap. xii. 1—3 is not to be brought about by human valour or policy but is of a wholly supernatural kind. It is therefore legitimate to conclude that the book of Daniel was finished at the time when the armed opposition of the Jews to Antiochus was in its earliest stage, and had as yet met with little success (chap. xi. 34).

x. 1—3. The third year of Cyrus is the latest date given in Daniel's life; on the difficulty of reconciling this date with chap. i. 21 see p. 63. Some commentators have spent much time in discussing why Daniel remained in Babylonia until the third year of Cyrus instead of availing himself of the opportunity to return to Palestine. If we regarded the narrative of Daniel as historical it might be worth while to seek for an explanation of the fact, but for those who believe Daniel to be an ideal figure no explanation is needed. In v. 1 we find the incorrect spelling בְּלֹטָשָׁאָר (so Baer) instead of בְּלֹטָשָׁאָר. The latter half of the verse is rendered by Von Lengerke—"And truth is the revelation and (the) distress is great: and understand thou the revelation, and understand it in the vision". Both בֵּין and בִּנְהָה he explains as Imperatives; the author, he supposes, is here addressing the reader, and the suffix in הַ refers to תְּהִנָּה. Much more probable is Hitzig's interpretation—"And the word is truth, and great distress; and he heeded the word and gave heed to the vision". But the meaning of נְצָר is here very uncertain. The proper sense of the word is "military service", hence it is applied metaphorically to toil and sorrow (Is. xl. 2. Job vii. 1); since however in Dan. viii. 13 אֲצָר seems to mean the "service" in the Temple, it is possible that here some such thought may be present, namely that of an "obligation" or "charge" laid upon Daniel. According to Hitzig, בֵּין is a Perfect Hiphil, with dropping of the initial ה (see what has been said onchap. ix. 2), and בִּנְהָה is an abstract noun, with the accent thrown back, as in קִינָה הִיא Ezek. xix. 14. Hävernick makes בֵּין to be an Infinitive used substantivally, a view which is certainly not favoured by the construction of the sentence. Olshausen regards the word as a perfect Kal (Lehrb. d. hebr. Sprache, p. 486). There remain two possibilities—may be either a mistake for בָּנָה (Perfect), as J. D. Michaelis supposed, or it may be an Infinitive used in the place of a Perfect (cf. סָמֵך chap. ix. 11). Instead of וּבֵין both the LXX. and Aquila read יְבֵין, which is doubtless an error. In v. 2 we are not told for what reason Daniel mourned, but from v. 12 we may conclude that it was from anxiety as to the fate of Israel. For the phrase שְׁלֹשָׁה שְׁבָעִים יְמִים "three full weeks" cf. Gen. xli. 1. Deut. xxi. 13.

לְקַמְּפָדָה “dainty bread” (v. 3) is, as Hävernick remarks, the opposite of לְקַמְּפָאֵן (Deut. xvi. 3).

4—8. The vision which now follows took place on the 24th day of the 1st month (i.e. Abib or, as it was called by the post-exilic Jews, Nisan), the month of the Passover; Daniel, with some companions, was by the river תִּגְرָאֵל (Tigris), a river which is mentioned nowhere else in the Old Testament excepting in Gen. ii. 14. The form תִּגְרָאֵל is peculiar, for the Tigris is in Syriac Deklath, in Arabic Dijla, and in Assyrio-Babylonian usually Diglat; but according to Schrader a form Idiglat is also found. Schrader supposes that the Hebrew and Syriac forms, with p, follow the Assyrian pronunciation, whereas the Arabic Dijla is based upon the more primitive Babylonian form, with g (Cuneif. Inscr. p. 33). In v. 5 the description of the angel is probably taken from Ezek. ix. 2; he is “clothed with linen” like a Jewish priest (Lev. vi. 3), and his girdle is of the gold of Uphaz. This district, mentioned nowhere else but in Jer. x. 9, has never been identified. Ewald and others have suggested that אֹוְפִי is either a mistake for אֹוְקִיר (Ps. xlv. 10), or a phonetic variation of the same name. In v. 6 פֶּלְשִׁישׁ (cf. Exod. xxviii. 20. Ezek. i. 16; xxviii. 13) is usually supposed to be the chrysolith or topaz. פֶּלְשִׁישׁ means, according to Von Lengerke, “the place where his feet rested”, according to Hitzig “his feet” simply; the latter interpretation agrees better with the context, cf. Rev. i. 15 where this passage is imitated. The phrase קָעִין חַחְשָׁת קָלָל is borrowed from Ezek. i. 7, and is commonly rendered “like the appearance of polished brass”. But although the use of the masc. form קָלָל with נִחְשָׁת would in itself offer no difficulty (see I Kings vii. 45. Ezra viii. 27), the text of Ezek. i. 7 is very suspicious; Cornill suggests that we should there read בְּעֵן נִחְשָׁת וּבְנִפְיָהֶם קָלוֹת according to the LXX. The corruption, if it exists, must of course be older than the book of Daniel; what meaning the author attached to קָלָל it is impossible to say. That קָלָל has anything to do with “to shake” (Ezek. xxi. 26. Eccles. x. 10) appears extremely improbable. וּקְוֵיל רְבָרִוּ קְבוּל הַטָּמֵן “and the sound of his words was as the sound of a deep murmur”; since הַטָּמֵן is quite a general term, applying to any deep sound, it is unnecessary to limit its meaning here to a “multitude” or the “sea”. In v. 7 בְּהַקְבָּא seems to mean “seeking to hide themselves”, lit. “in the act of hiding themselves”—we should rather have expected לְהַקְבָּא (cf. I Kings xxii. 25). The phrase (v. 8) וְהוּא נִקְבֵּךְ אֶלְיָהָרְתִּית is the Hebrew equivalent of “and my comeliness was turned in me to corruption” is the Hebrew equivalent of v. 9; somewhat similar is the language in which Habakkuk describes the effect of a divine revelation (Hab. iii. 16). For the use of מְשֻׁחָת in the abstract sense cf. Ezek. xxi. 36. II Chron. xx. 23; xxii. 4. On שְׂמָחוֹת פָּתָח see p. 29.

9—11. As in chap. viii. 18, Daniel becomes unconscious; וְאֵין קִיּוֹת נְרוּם וְנוּן “after I had fallen into a slumber” etc., seems to be a circumstantial clause inserted parenthetically, the apodosis beginning with v. 10. It has been much discussed whether the being who touches Daniel in v. 10 and who speaks in the following verses, is identical with the being described in vv. 5 and 6. Von Lengerke regards them as distinct, and supposes that the angel of vv. 10 ff. is Gabriel. Hitzig, on the other hand, identifies the angel of vv. 5 and 6 with that of vv. 10 ff., but denies that Gabriel is intended. The question is fortunately not of any great importance, as it concerns the form only, not the substance, of the vision. וְתַגְנִיעֲנִי עַל־בָּרְכִּי וּכְפֹתֵחַ נִי is usually explained as a constructio praegnans, i.e. “and caused me to tremble upon my knees and the palms of my hands”, meaning “and set me upon my knees and hands which were trembling”. On אִישׁ חִמְרֹת (v. 11) see chap. ix. 23, and on עַמְּדָה עַל־צְמַרְדָּךְ chap. viii. 18. מְשֻׁחָת is here intransitive, as in Ezra x. 9.

12—14. The angel now proceeds to reveal what has been passing in heaven. From the beginning of the three weeks, when Daniel set himself “to attain to understanding” (as to the destiny of Israel) and to humble himself before God, his petition had been accepted. וְאֵין קָאתִי בְּרָכָרִיךְ “and I am come by reason of thy words”, cf. וּבְדָבָרִיךְ (Kērī) I Kings xviii. 36. The coming of the angel was delayed for a while (v. 13) by the opposition of “the prince of the kingdom of Persia”, i.e. the guardian angel of the Persian Empire—not Cyrus, as Hävernick and others have imagined. The belief in the guardian angels of nations is perhaps assumed in Is. xxiv. 21 and Ps. lxxxii.;

since however both passages are not only very obscure but of unknown date, we have no means of discovering at what period the idea arose among the Jews. The fact that in Dan. x. this belief is rather presupposed than definitely stated shews that the author is here dealing with a conception already familiar to his readers, and hence nothing can be more absurd than to argue from Ecclesiasticus xvii. 17 that Ben-Sirā must have borrowed the idea from Daniel. The guardian angel of the Jews is Michael (see chap. xii. 1), who is here described as one of “the chief princes”, i.e. the archangels, and who comes to the aid of the speaker. נוֹתְרָתִי is variously explained as “I obtained the precedence” (Gesenius, Hävernick, Von Lengerke), “I remained”, i.e. I was delayed (Hitzig), and “I was superfluous” (Ewald). But nowhere else does the verb bear any one of these meanings. Graetz proposes to read וְאַתָּה חֹתְרָתִי “and him I left”, alleging the authority of the LXX. and Theodotion. But the words καὶ αὐτὸν ἐκεῖ κατέλιπτον are probably a mere guess, and do not presuppose any variant, for the insertion of αὐτὸν and the substitution of a transitive for an intransitive verb are quite in the manner of the LXX. translator. Perhaps, retaining the traditional text, we may take וְאַנְיִנוּ נוֹתְרָתִי וְנוּ as a circumstantial clause describing the previous situation of the speaker, “whereas I had been left (alone) there, (contending) with the kings of Persia”, cf. Jer. ii. 21; xxiii. 32. Ezek. xiii. 7. מלֶכֶם “the kings of Persia” seems to be an intentionally vague phrase for “the Persian dynasty” or “the power of the Persian Empire”. It is quite unnecessary to suppose, with Bertholdt, that the word שׁ has fallen out before מלֶכֶם, for the rendering of the LXX. (μετὰ τοῦ στρατηγοῦ τοῦ βασιλέως Περσῶν) is probably an expansion of the original, just as in v. 20 קָרֵם is translated μετὰ τοῦ στρατηγοῦ βασιλέως τῶν Περσῶν. It is of course impossible to say what was the author’s conception as to the nature of the contest between this angel and the angel of the Persian Empire. Von Lengerke suggests that the passage refers to some change in the policy of the Persian government towards the Jews, but this is to import into the book ideas which are nowhere expressed in it, for Daniel’s solicitude on behalf of his people is described in perfectly general terms, without any hint that his anxiety was due to special circumstances. With יְבָנֵךְ (v. 14) compare the parallel passage in chap. ix. 23 וְאַנְּצִחָה לְכֶם אֶת אֲשֶׁר-יֹקְרָא אֶתְכֶם; the following words were apparently suggested by Gen. xlvi. 1 אֶתְכֶם בְּאַתְּנִידָר, instead of בְּאַתְּנִידָר הַיּוֹם. The Masoretes read בְּיָמָה, instead of בְּיָמָה, in order to assimilate the two passages. The phrase is rendered by Von Lengerke “since the vision is still for these days”, i.e. for the aforesaid days; but if this were the meaning, we should expect עַד לְיָמִים הַחُזָּן for לְיָמִים, on account of inchap. viii. 26. It is perhaps more natural to translate, retaining the Masoretic vocalization, “since there is yet a vision for the days”, i.e. there is one vision more, relating to the days before mentioned.

15—xi. 1. נִתְחַזֵּק פָּנֵי אֶرְצָה “I bent my face towards the earth” does not imply that Daniel again fell prostrate. The “one like the sons of men” (v. 16), who touches Daniel’s lips, must be the angel who has spoken previously. When at length Daniel speaks, he seeks to excuse his confusion, “My lord, by reason of the vision my pangs came upon me, and I retained no strength; and how should a servant of my lord speak with my lord?” The expression נִתְחַזֵּק is a metaphor borrowed from childbirth (I Sam. iv. 19); such comparisons are used elsewhere to describe the prophetic excitement (Is. xxi. 3). On the Aramaic form נִתְחַזֵּק see p. 29, note. In v. 17 זֶה is a demonstrative particle added by way of emphasis (cf. Gen. xxvii. 21), and corresponds in meaning to the German da; in English we have no exact equivalent. The latter half of v. 17, if the Masoretic text be correct, must be a continuation of Daniel’s speech—“and as for me henceforth there remains in me no strength, nor is any breath left in me”. Von Lengerke takes these words as part of the narrative, but though in German we may say “von nun an” in speaking of the past, the Hebrew מִשְׁעָה always refers to the present. Von Lengerke’s objection that since Daniel has already said לא שְׁעָרָתִי בָּה in v. 16, it is needless for him to make a similar statement in v. 17, proves very little, for terror and perplexity may naturally lead to repetitions. But however we take the passage, it must be owned that מִשְׁעָה is very strange in this connection—the Peshitta omits the word, and the LXX. has ἡσθέ-

וְנַסָּא (i.e. מִשְׁתֵּחַ, cf. Ps. xviii. 37). Possibly מִשְׁתֵּחַ may be a corruption of מִבְּשַׁתָּה “from terror”, cf. נִבְשַׁתָּי chap. viii. 17; the root בָּשַׁת is applied specially to supernatural alarm or panic (Is. xxi. 4. Job vi. 4; xviii. 11 etc.). In v. 18 the expression קָמְרָאָה אֶתְם בָּאֵי אֶתְם is the subject of the preceding verbs, cf. קָמְתִּים בָּאֵי אֶתְם in v. 16. For פָּנִים פָּנִים (v. 19) the LXX. has ἀνδρίζου καὶ σχνε, the Peshitta حَمَدِيَّة سَلَمِيَّة, apparently reading חֹק וָמֵץ (Deut. xxxi. 7, 23. Josh. i. 6, 7, 9, 18. I Chr. xxii. 12; xxviii. 20). חֹק חֹק is at least exceptional, for when the Imperative is repeated, the conjunction is not used (Judg. v. 12. II Sam. xvi. 7. Is. li. 9; lii. 1, 11; lvii. 14. Ezek. xxxiii. 11. Ps. cxxxvii. 7). Instead of יְבָרֶכְךָ, which is found in the ordinary printed texts, the best MSS. have וְבָרֶכְךָ. The first clause of v. 20 is an affirmation put into the form of a question, for Daniel has already been informed as to the reason of the angel’s coming (v. 14), cf. I Sam. ii. 27. Ezek. xx. 4. The train of thought in vv. 20 and 21 may appear at first sight to proceed “in a zig-zag” (Hitzig), but the connection is probably as follows—“I am come to bring thee a revelation, but cannot linger, for I must return at once (שָׁהָר) to contend against the enemies of Israel; I will however (אֲבָל) stay long enough to unveil the future to thee, although during my absence from the strife there is no one but Michael to defend the right cause”. וְאַנְּיִי יָצָא is explained by Von Lengerke, “and I go forth (to fight with the angel of Persia)”; Bertholdt and Hitzig more naturally interpret “and as soon as I come forth (from the contest with the angel of Persia), the angel of Greece will appear (to oppose me)” — i.e. as soon as the Persian supremacy is over, another enemy will arise. The “writing of truth” is the book of divine decrees, cf. Ps. cxxxix. 16. On the phrase תְּחִזֵּק טָהָר “helping me”, see p. 29. עַל־אֶתְם “against these” refers doubtless to the angel of Persia and the other hostile powers. The first verse of chap. xi. must be examined in connection with what precedes. As the text stands, it presents great difficulties, and those difficulties are further complicated by the wide disagreement between the ancient versions. Von Lengerke renders, “But I also, in the first year of Darius the Mede, stood by him as helper and defender”. He explains the verse as alluding to the conquest of Babylon, and makes the suffix in לְ refer to Michael. Others, e.g. Hävernick, refer the suffix to Darius. But the statement that the speaker had helped Michael, or Darius, some years earlier, has nothing to do either with the verse preceding or with the verse following. Moreover the use of עַמְקִי, "my standing", in the place of עַמְקִי is scarcely justified by such a passage as Job ix. 27. The LXX. reads—Καὶ ἐν τῷ ἐνιαυτῷ τῷ πρώτῳ Κύρου τοῦ βασιλέως εἰπέν μοι ἐνισχύσαι καὶ ἀνδρίζεσθαι. There is here no trace of עַמְקִי, and even the καὶ does not necessarily presuppose a conjunction in the Hebrew<sup>1</sup>. Thus the Hebrew basis of the LXX. appears to have been בָשְׁנַת אֶחָת [וּבָשְׁנַת] אָמֵר לְמַחוֹן קָרְבָּנוּ לְ. Here אָמֵר is presumably a corruption of עָמַד. The Peshitta comes nearer to the Masoretic text, but attaches וְאַנְיִי to chap. x. 21, and reads עָמַד for עָמֵד and לְ for לְ. Hence the reading לְ is supported by the combined testimony of the LXX. and of the Peshitta, and the Masoretic reading עָמֵד is supported by neither. Prof. Robertson Smith has suggested that the words בָשְׁנַת אֶחָת לְרוֹיֵשׁ הָמָרִי are a fragment of a heading which was wrongly introduced here by a scribe (cf. the headings in chaps. vii. 1; viii. 1; ix. 1; x. 1). After the words had been incorporated with the text, וְאַנְיִי may have been added in order to make sense. This hypothesis would account for the absence of וְאַנְיִי in the LXX. If we read עָמַד for עָמֵד, and לְ for לְ, the latter part of the verse may be understood as a continuation of chap. x. 21, וְאַנְיִ אֶחָד מִתְחַזֵּק כִּי אִם מִיכָּאֵל שְׁرָכֶם עֲפָר לְמַחוֹן וְלְמַעֲוז לְ, i.e. "there is none that helpeth me against these, save that Michael your prince standeth as a strengthener and a defence to me".

2—4. The revelation properly speaking now begins. There are to be three more Persian kings after Cyrus, and the fourth Persian king, that is, the last of the three above-mentioned, will be richer than all his predecessors. In this last king all commentators recognize Xerxes, the two preceding kings being probably Darius and Artaxerxes. Nor is it any valid objection to this interpretation that in reality there were many more than four Persian kings after Cyrus, and that the first Artaxerxes reigned after, not before, Xerxes. For in the Old Testament, which was doubtless the principal source of information accessible to the author of Daniel, only four names of Persian kings happen to occur, viz. Cyrus, Darius, Xerxes and Artaxerxes, and as to the order in which the last two reigned nothing is positively stated. That the Darius mentioned in Neh. xii. 22 is a different person from the Darius mentioned elsewhere, may easily have escaped the notice of readers in the 2nd century B.C. וְכִתְקַה בָּשֵׂר “and when he shall have grown strong by reason of his wealth” (so Hitzig), cf. II Chr. xii. 1; xxvi. 16; חִקָּה is here a verbal noun like יְרָאָה. The phrase יְשִׁיר הַפְּלָא תְּמִלְכֹות is very obscure. Von Lengerke renders “he will stir up all, (even) the kingdom of Greece”; but if the clause refers, as it apparently does, to the war of Xerxes against Greece, such an expression would be meaningless. More natural is the interpretation of the Vulgate, which is followed by Bertholdt and De Wette, “et concitabit omnes adversum regnum Graeciae”. It is true that, as Von Lengerke objects, תְּמִלְכֹה nowhere else means “against”—excepting where some such word as מִלְחָמָה or לִלְכָד precedes (Gen. xiv. 9. I Chr. xx. 5)—but since מִלְכָה is so used (Ps. xciv. 16), the thing cannot be pronounced absolutely impossible. Hitzig explains תְּמִלְכֹה as indicating motion “towards”. Perhaps תְּמִלְכֹה may be a corruption of תְּמִלְךָ[ךְ], “he shall array (his armies) against the kingdom of Greece”, cf. I Sam. iv. 2. II Sam. x. 9, 10, 17. The expression “the kingdom of Greece” shews, as Hitzig remarks, that the author imagined Greece to have been a monarchy, like the Oriental states. The “mighty, or warlike, king”, who appears in v. 3, is doubtless Alexander the Great. The beginning of v. 4 is usually translated, “and when he has stood up”, but probably we should read, with Graetz, וְבָעֲמָדוֹ “and when he has become strong”, according to the parallel passage, chap. viii. 8. The corruption may easily be explained by the וְיָמָיו of v. 3. Much less plausible is Hitzig’s interpretation, “and when he dies” (taking שָׁכְדוֹ as equivalent to אָגֵר), for the verb שָׁרֵד “to die”, though common in Syriac, is unknown in Jewish Aramaic, as well as in Hebrew. With תְּשִׁיבֶר מֶלֶכְתָּו “his kingdom shall be broken up”, cf. נִשְׁבְּרָה הַמֶּלֶךְ chap. viii. 8. The form וְתִזְקַנֵּי, “and it shall be divided”, is peculiar, for we should expect וְהַחֲזָה, since the Imperfect is here used in the sense of a simple Future; similar are וְיִשְׁלַׁח in v. 16, וְיִשְׁם (not יִשְׁלַׁמ) in v. 17, וְיִשְׁבֶּן (not יִשְׁבֵּן) in v. 28, etc. Prof. Driver supposes that in all these cases the apocopated form is used incorrectly "without any recollection of its distinctive signification" (Tenses, p. 247). The latter half of v. 4 seems to mean, "and (it shall) not (belong) to his posterity, nor (shall it be) according to the rule which he had ruled, for his Empire shall be overthrown and (shall belong) to others, besides these". After וְלֹא לְאֶחָרִיו and after אֶתְּנָה we must understand נָה or תָּה, cf. chap. viii. 19, 26, as well as Ps. xvi. 8. The rule of Alexander's successors is to be feebler than that of Alexander himself (cf. וְלֹא בְּכָהו chap. viii. 22). To whom אֶלְּךָ refers is not clear. Von Lengerke, following Jerome, makes it apply to the first successors of Alexander, i.e. his empire was first to be divided among his generals, and afterwards was to be still further broken up. According to this view, the אֶתְּנָה would be the dynasties which arose in Cappadocia, Armenia, and other countries, during the century and a half that followed upon the death of Alexander. Hitzig, on the other hand, translates "to others, to the exclusion of these", referring אֶתְּנָה to the first successors of Alexander, and אֶלְּךָ to his posterity (אֶתְּנָה), i.e. his two sons who were murdered in their infancy; but מִלְּכָר elsewhere means "in addition to", not "to the exclusion of", which would rather be פָּנָה (Gen. iv. 25. I Kings xx. 24).

<sup>1</sup> Cf. chap. vii. 19 καὶ οἴοντο οἱ ὄδοντες αὐτοῦ; ix. 19 καὶ μὴ χρονήσῃς.

5, 6. From this point onwards the history is confined to the kingdoms of the South and the North, i.e. the kingdom of the Ptolemies and that of the Seleucidae. These two dynasties successively dominated Palestine, and therefore occupy the attention of the author. During the greater part of the 3rd century B.C. the country was under the Ptolemies, but about the end of that century it was permanently incorporated with the Seleucid empire. The king of the South, in v. 5, is Ptolemy Soter, son of Lagus, who having long been master of Egypt, assumed the title of king in 306 B.C. The verse is usually rendered, "And the king of the South shall be strong, and one of his captains (shall be strong likewise), but he (i.e. the latter) shall become stronger than he (i.e. the former), and shall rule, a great domain shall be his dominion". Probably, however, the Masoretic accentuation is here erroneous, and the words יְמִלְחָדָר should be taken, as Hitzig proposes, with what follows, so that the sense will be, "And the king of the South shall be strong; but as for one of his captains he shall become stronger than he" etc. It is unnecessary to read יְהֹוָה for יְהֹוָה, with Meinholt, since the construction is the same as in chap. vii. 20 וּקְרָבָא רַבָּן וְעַיִן ? לֵב. For the omission of אֶחָד "one", before מ, cf. Exod. vi. 25. Neh. xiii. 28. The suffix in צָרִים refers to Ptolemy Soter; the captain in question is Seleucus Nicator, who served in the army of Ptolemy and afterwards, in 306 B.C., became independent sovereign of Northern Syria, Babylonia, and the other eastern provinces of Alexander's empire. Seleucus' son and successor, Antiochus Soter, is here passed over in silence. Verse 6 describes the relations between Ptolemy II. (Philadelphus) and Antiochus Theos, son of Antiochus Soter. About 250 B.C. Ptolemy Philadelphus gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Antiochus Theos, on condition that the latter should divorce his former wife Laodice and that the posterity of Berenice should succeed to the throne of the Seleucidae. When after two years Ptolemy died, Antiochus took back his former wife and divorced Berenice. Laodice, however, fearing that her husband might change his mind, poisoned him. Berenice and her infant son were soon afterwards murdered near Antioch. Von Lengerke translates, "And at the end of some years they shall make an alliance together, and the daughter of the king of the South shall come to the king of the North, to establish an agreement. But she will not retain any power of support, and neither he will abide nor his support, and she shall be given up, and those who have made her a bride, and he who begat her, and he who obtained possession of her in those times". For the phrase לְאַז שָׁאִים cf. II Chr. xviii. 2. The verb חִתְּכָרֵךְ refers, of course, to the king of the South and the king of the North; the author however, considers it unnecessary to state that the kings in this verse are not the same individuals as those mentioned in v. 5. קְרִיאָתָם elsewhere means that which is "right" or "fitting", hence it is used for "an equitable arrangement"; Hitzig compares the use of δίκαια in I Macc. vii. 12. As יְמִלְחָדָר is employed metaphorically in vv. 15, 22, 31, we may take it so here; since however the notion of an “army” is inappropriate in this verse, שָׁרֵךְ may signify the political “support” which Berenice gave to her father Ptolemy. But Von Lengerke’s rendering of אַל תִּשְׁעַר פֹּתַח הַאֲרוֹן, “aber sie wird Kraft des Beistandes nicht behaupten”, is syntactically open to objection. Wherever else the phrase כִּי עָצֶר כְּהֵן occurs, is in the absolute state, and, as Graetz has noticed, the analogy of II Chr. xiii. 20 is certainly in favour of regarding שָׁרֵךְ as the subject of the clause. וְלֹא יִשְׁמְדֵר וְיִרְשֶׁה is understood by Von Lengerke as meaning “neither Ptolemy will abide, nor his support Berenice”. But if the preceding שָׁרֵךְ refers to the support afforded by Berenice, it is very unlikely that שָׁרֵךְ refers to Berenice herself. More probably we should read, with Hitzig, וְלֹא יִשְׁמְדֵר וְרָשֵׁב (see vv. 15, 31), “nor shall his arms abide”. But the suffix in שָׁרֵךְ can scarcely refer to the feminine שָׁרֵךְ, as Hitzig supposes—it is far more natural to explain it as referring to Ptolemy. Thus the sense of these two clauses would seem to be, “neither shall that support (which is afforded by Berenice) be of any avail, nor shall his (other) supports prove effectual”. The remainder of this verse presents such insuperable difficulties that there is every reason for believing the text to be corrupt. To interpret תִּתְּחַזֵּן as “she shall be given up to destruction” is to assign to the verb a sense which it bears nowhere else, for in Is. li. 12 חַזֵּיר יִתְּחַזֵּן need mean no more than “which shall be made as grass”; when נתן is construed with ל or בַּיד, we may of course render it by “give up” or “deliver over”, but תִּתְּחַזֵּן by itself signifies only “she shall be given”. מִבְּאַחַת (so the best MSS. read, with defective spelling) is referred by some, as Ewald, to “those who accompanied” Berenice from Egypt to Syria, and by Von Lengerke to “those who concluded her marriage”, i.e. her father and her husband. Hitzig understands it of her husband only, the Plural being used for the Singular (cf. בְּעַלְיָה Is. liv. 5). הַיְלָךְ, if correctly pointed, must be Ptolemy; for the use of the article before a participle with suffix compare הַמְּפֻנָּה Is. ix. 12. מִזְקָה is referred by Von Lengerke to Antiochus, the verb having the same sense as in v. 21; Ewald and Hitzig explain מִזְקָה as “he who strengthened her” or “he who upheld her”, and refer the word to Ptolemy. בָּשְׂתִּים may perhaps be equivalent to בָּשְׂתִּים (v. 14), just as in chap. x. 14 לַיְמִים seems to mean "for those days". But on the whole it is more probable that here something has fallen out.

7—9. The three verses which now follow describe the reigns of Ptolemy III. (Euergetes) and of Seleucus Callinicus, eldest son and successor of Antiochus Theos. Ptolemy Euergetes, at the beginning of his reign, avenged the murder of Berenice by invading Syria and Babylonia, whence he carried off an immense booty. Possibly however we should read מֵגֶזֶר שְׁרַשְ׀ׁׁי (LXX. φυτὸν ἐκ τῆς μίζης αὐτοῦ), see Is. xi. 1. בְּנָנו evidently has the same meaning as in vv. 20, 21, i.e. "instead of him". With בְּנָנו used thus abverbially, cf. the Arab. maikāmahu; the indiscriminate use of עַל־בְּנָנו and בְּנָנו is like the indiscriminate use of בְּבִית הָאֱלֹהִים (II Chr. iv. 11; xxii. 12) and בְּבִית הָאֱלֹהִים (I Chr. ix. 26; II Chr. iv. 19) "in the house of God". The suffix in שְׁרַשְ׀ׁׁי obviously refers to Berenice, and the suffix in בְּנָנו to Ptolemy Philadelphus. Thus there is to arise in the place of Ptolemy Philadelphus an offshoot of the roots whence Berenice had sprung, i.e. her brother, Ptolemy Euergetes, will succeed to the throne of Egypt. וַיָּבֹא אֶל־הַחִיל is explained by Von Lengerke, Ewald, and Hitzig, as "and he shall come to the army", i.e. he shall place himself at the head of his army in order to invade Syria. But it is not easy to see why the king should be described as coming to his army rather than with it (see v. 13). Hävernick's rendering "and he shall come into power" is wholly unsupported by usage. Perhaps we should read חִיל [וַיָּבֹא אֶל־הַ] "and he shall bring an army against them", i.e. against the Syrians; for the use of ל instead of על, see chap. viii. 7. Hitzig is probably right in making מַעַן in this verse refer to the fortified city of Seleucia, on the Mediterranean coast. According to Polybius (v. 58), Seleucia was taken by Ptolemy during this war and remained for many years afterwards in the power of Egypt. וַיַּעֲשֵׂה בָּם וְהַפְּרִיק "and he shall do as he wills with them and act valiantly" (cf. יְחִזְקֵי וְאַשְׁׁׁוּׁׁי v. 32, also Neh. ix. 24)—the suffix in בָּם refers to the Syrians, as do also the suffixes in אֱלֹהִים and the following words (v. 8). נְסָכִים certainly means “their molten images”, and unless it be merely a mistake for נְסִיךְם, is from a Singular נְסִיךְ synonymous with נְסֶךְ (Is. xlvi. 5); similarly we find פְּסִילִים “graven images” used as a virtual plural of פְּסָלֵל. Jerome relates, presumably on the authority of Porphyry, that among the spoils which Ptolemy brought away with him were the statues of Egyptian gods carried off by Cambyses some 280 years earlier. Hence, it is said, the Egyptians gave to Ptolemy the title of Euergetes. With קְلִי חַמְדָתֶם “their costly things” cf. II Chr. xxxii. 27; xxxvi. 10. The words קְלִי חַמְדָתֶם can scarcely stand in apposition to הַכְּסָפָה וְהַזְּהָב, for in that case we should expect הַכְּסָפָה וְהַזְּהָב, the preceding nouns being defined by the suffix. It is better to take קְלִי חַמְדָתֶם as a term of specification (Arab. tamyaz), “in silver and gold”; cf. I Chr. xxviii. 18. The last clause of v. 8 is interpreted by Von Lengerke, Hitzig, and Ewald, “and for some years he will refrain from (attacking) the king of the North”; see Gen. xxix. 35. II Kings iv. 6. Others explain, “and he shall continue alive some years longer than the king of the North”. In v. 9 the verbs בָּא and שָׁב must refer to the king of the North. Some years after Ptolemy’s invasion of Syria, Seleucus Callinicus made an expedition against Egypt. He was totally defeated, and returned with a small remnant of his army to Antioch.

10—12. The next ten verses are occupied with the times of Antiochus III., known as Antiochus the Great. Seleucus Callinicus left two sons, Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus. The former was killed, after a reign of two years, during a campaign in Asia Minor. Antiochus, who succeeded to the throne, soon afterwards made war upon Ptolemy Philopator, son and successor of Ptolemy Euergetes, and conquered Syria as far as Gaza. Thereupon Ptolemy marched from Egypt and defeated him with severe loss at Raphia, about twenty miles to the south west of Gaza. Antiochus having retreated northward, Palestine was again annexed to the empire of Ptolemy. In v. 10 “his sons” refers to Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus. Von Lengerke has observed that though Seleucus Ceraunus never actually made war upon Egypt, his expedition into Asia Minor may be regarded as a prelude to an intended attack upon the Ptolemaic Empire. Hence it may be said of him and of his brother, “they shall war and gather together a multitude of great forces”—but the following words must describe events subsequent to the death of Seleucus<sup>1</sup>. For the placing of the Infinitive absolute after the Perfect, see Num. xxiii. 11; xxiv. 10. The words וְאַבָּא בֹּא וַעֲבָר יִשְׁפַּחַת are referred by Von Lengerke and Hitzig to Antiochus; Ewald more naturally refers them to the multitude (הַמּוֹן) mentioned before. Thus we may render, “and it (i.e. the army of Antiochus) shall come onward and shall sweep away (all before it) and overflow (the land); then it shall return again (to the attack), and they shall war even to his stronghold”. The word יֵשֶׁב seems to allude to the fact that after the conquest of part of Coele-Syria, the army of Antiochus retired northward to winter in the neighbourhood of Seleucia, garrisons having been left in the conquered cities (Polybius v. 66); in the following spring the army “returned again” to complete the conquest. For the Plural יִתְנַרֵו the Keri substitutes the easier יִתְנַרָה. Von Lengerke refers יִתְנַרֵו to Antiochus and Ptolemy Philopator. Since however the next verse represents Ptolemy as “coming forth” to fight, it is more natural to suppose that יִתְנַרֵו (assuming it to be the original reading) refers to the army of Antiochus, which may be treated either as a Singular or a Plural. The word מֶצְחָה “his stronghold” is explained by Von Lengerke as meaning the stronghold of Ptolemy, viz. Raphia; Hitzig interprets it as the stronghold of Antiochus, viz. Gaza. This latter view may at first appear irreconcileable with v. 7, where חַלְקָה מְעֻזָּן seems to designate Seleucia; but since in v. 19 we read of מְעֻזָּן אֶרְצָן, there is no reason why several places should not be called by this title. That Pelusium (פְּלָעִים), described by Ezekiel as קָטוּן מְצָרִים (Ezek. xxx. 15), cannot here be meant, is obvious, for Antiochus never advanced so far during this campaign. In v. 11 Ptolemy appears upon the scene. At first he made no attempt to arrest the progress of Antiochus, but was at length induced by his ministers to advance with a large force. For חַמְרָר! see chap. viii. 7, and also p. 30. The latter half of v. 11 means, according to Von Lengerke, "And he (i.e. Ptolemy) shall raise a great army, and the army shall be placed under his command". So also Hitzig, excepting that he prefers to read וְיִמְשַׁל "and he shall place", rather than וְיִמְשַׁל. But in either case it is extremely doubtful whether the text will bear the above sense; the passages cited by Hitzig (II Kings xviii. 23. Ps. x. 14) are far from conclusive. It is certainly more in accordance with Hebrew usage to translate "the multitude shall be given into his hand" (i.e. it shall be defeated by him), cf. I Kings xx. 28. But since הַמֹּתָן בְּ must refer to the הַמֹּתָן בְּ immediately preceding, it becomes necessary to take the verb הַעֲמִיד! as having Antiochus for its subject. Hence we may interpret, "And he (i.e. Antiochus) shall raise a great multitude, but the multitude shall be given into his (i.e. Ptolemy's) hand". This view is confirmed by v. 13, where the "multitude greater than the former one" evidently means the army of Antiochus. Verse 12 is interpreted both by Von Lengerke and Hitzig, "And the multitude shall stand up (to fight), their courage being raised, and he (i.e. Ptolemy) shall cast down myriads, but he shall not shew himself strong". According to this explanation, אֵין has the same sense as in Is. xxxiii. 10, and רוּם לְכֻבוֹד is a circumstantial clause. But if, as has been before suggested, the הַמֹּתָן of v. 11 is the army of Antiochus, the הַמֹּתָן of v. 12 must refer to the same thing. Accordingly the first half of v. 12 appears to mean, "And the multitude shall be swept away (i.e. routed), and his (i.e. Ptolemy's) heart shall be puffed up with pride" (reading רַם according to the Kerî). For this use of אֵין see chap. ii. 35 and Is. xl. 24; xl. 16; lvii. 13. The term "myriads" must be understood in a rhetorical sense. According to Polybius (v. 86), the losses of Antiochus at Raphia amounted to nearly 10000 infantry and 300 cavalry, besides 4000 taken prisoners. וְלֹא יִשְׂרַעַל "but he shall not shew himself strong", accurately describes the conduct of Ptolemy on this occasion. Instead of following up his success, he contented himself with the acquisition of Coele-

<sup>1</sup> The words of Jerome—“Post fumgam et mortem Seleuci Callinici, duo filii ejus Seleucus cognomento Ceraunus et Antiochus qui appellatus est Magnus, provocati spe victoriae et ultione parentis, exercitu congregato adversus Pto-

lemaeum Philopatorem arma corripiunt”—are apparently nothing but a deduction drawn from this passage of Daniel, for in reality Seleucus Ceraunus died before the accession of Ptolemy Philopator.

Syria, and made peace with Antiochus as soon as possible (Polybius v. 87).

13—16. About 12 years after the battle of Raphia, Ptolemy Philopator died leaving an infant son, who succeeded to the crown and is known as Ptolemy Epiphanes. Antiochus soon took the opportunity of again attacking the Ptolemaic Empire. In v. 13, וְשָׁבַע is adverbial, “And again the king of the North shall raise a multitude, greater than the former one...”. In the latter half of this verse, שָׁמִים is explained by Von Lengerke as being in apposition to הַשְׁעִירִים, i.e. “at the end of the time (consisting of) some years”—in which case the presence of הַשְׁעִירִים is altogether unnecessary and even disturbing to the sense. Ewald translates, “At the end of the times he will come repeatedly (בָּאָה בָּאָה) during some years;” but for this we should expect שָׁנָה בְּשָׁנָה (see Neh. x. 36) rather than שָׁמִים. Perhaps שָׁמִים may have been added by a scribe in order to explain the vague term הַשְׁעִירִים, in accordance with וְלֹקֵן שָׁנִים in v. 6. For the placing of the Infinitive Absolute after the Imperfect, cf. II Kings v. 11. רְכִישָׁה בָּאָה after the Imperfect, which here seems to mean “implements of war” (so Hitzig, Ewald) and which in v. 24 means “possessions” in general, is a word peculiar to the Pentateuch and to post-exilic writings. In v. 14, the “many” who “stand up against the king of the South” may be taken as a reference to Philip, king of Macedon, the ally of Antiochus, and to the rebellions which at this time broke out in the provinces subject to Ptolemy. The rest of the verse evidently alludes to events which took place in Palestine. According to the usual interpretation, the בְּנֵי פְּרִיאָרִים טָפְחָה, “the sons of the violent among thy people” are those Jews who took part with Antiochus. The author, it is supposed, hating the Syrian rule, here expresses his disapprobation of those who helped to bring Palestine under the Seleucidae. Before discussing this theory, it is necessary to examine the words which follow, לְהַגְטִיד חַזֵּן, which are commonly rendered, “so as (thereby) to fulfil the prophecy”, i.e. the conduct of the Jews who sided with Antiochus, though in itself blameworthy, was necessary for the fulfilment of the Divine predictions. Against this it may fairly be urged that the author cannot here be speaking of an attempt which succeeded, but rather of an attempt which failed (ונכשלה). Accordingly Graetz wishes to render לְהַעֲמִיד חֹזֶן “to cause the Law to totter” (um das Gesetz wankend zu machen), cf. Ezek. xxix. 7. He explains the verse as referring to an attempt on the part of the Hellenizing faction among the Jews to abolish the Mosaic law. That such attempts were made at the period in question is quite possible, but חֹזֶן means “vision”, “prediction”, and is never used as an equivalent of תּוֹרָה or בְּרִית. Hence there seems to be no choice but to take לְהַעֲמִיד חֹזֶן in its literal and obvious sense—the author speaks of persons who “lift themselves up for the purpose of fulfilling prophecy”, but the attempt fails, “they are overthrown” (ונכשלה). But who are the violent among thy people? The phrase, as it stands, is very singular, for “the violent among thy people” would surely be expressed by בְּנֵי פְּרִיצִים עַמְקָה. We can no more say בְּנֵי צַדִּיקִים עַמְקָה for “violent persons” than we could say for “righteous persons”. Perhaps we should read “those who build up the breaches of thy people”, cf. Amos ix. 11 and the somewhat analogous phrase מִתְחַזֵּקי בָּקָשׁ Ezek. xxvii. 9. Our total ignorance as to the internal history of the Jews at this period makes it impossible to say what event the author of Daniel has here in view, but it may be suggested as at least not improbable that at the time when the Ptolemaic dynasty was losing its hold upon Judaea some of those who aimed at a restoration of Israel may have entertained hopes of throwing off the foreign yoke altogether and thereby of fulfilling the predictions of the prophets<sup>1</sup>. Such hopes were of course doomed to disappointment. The opening clause of v. 15, “And the king of the North shall come”, is understood by Von Lengerke as a mere repetition of the statement in v. 13, since v. 14 is of the nature of a parenthesis. Hitzig, on the contrary, refers v. 15 to a campaign subsequent to that mentioned in v. 13. Although the details of the war between Antiochus and Ptolemy Epiphanes are obscure, there can be no doubt that it lasted several years.

<sup>1</sup> It hardly requires to be said that the account given by Josephus (Antiq. XII. 3, 3, 4) of the help which Antiochus received from the Jews—even if it be strictly true—does not necessarily apply to the whole nation. We have also to remember that Josephus always does his best to conceal the hatred with which the Jews regarded the Gentile rule.

The fate of Palestine was virtually settled by the great victory which Antiochus gained at Mount Panium, near the Bāniyās source of the Jordan, over Ptolemy's general Scopas (Polybius XVI. 18; XXVIII. 1). According to Jerome, Scopas afterwards sought refuge, with an army of 10000 men, in the fortress of Sidon, which Antiochus besieged and took<sup>1</sup>. To this there seems to be an allusion here, “And he shall cast up earth-works and take a fortified city”. Instead of מִבְּצָרוֹת we elsewhere find the Plural מִבְּצָרִים, as in v. 24. Theod. and the Pesh. appear to have read שָׁרִים בְּצָרוֹת. The following words describe the total collapse of the Egyptian power in Syria. “And the forces of the South shall not withstand (Antiochus), nor (even) his (i.e. Ptolemy's) chosen men, and there shall be no strength to withstand. (v. 16) And he (i.e. Antiochus) who shall come against him (i.e. Ptolemy) shall do as he wills, and none shall withstand him, and he shall stand in the land of Glory, with destruction in his hand”. רשות, for which v. 31 has אַרְשִׁים, is a general term including not only armies but all means of offence or defence, cf. Ezra iv. 23. The phrase עַם מִבְּחָרֵי is peculiar, but may be compared to קָלִי מִבְּחָרֵי II Chr. xxxvi. 19. Whether the suffixes in מִבְּחָרֵי and אַלְיוֹ refer to Ptolemy or to “the South” is not quite clear; the sense in either case is the same. On אֶרְץ נָכְרִי, as a name for Judaea, see chap. viii. 9. The rendering given above for בְּכָלָה בְּיָדוֹ is that adopted by Hitzig. Von Lengerke and Ewald translate, “and it (i.e. the land) shall be wholly in his hand”, taking בְּכָלָה as an adverb (Gen. xviii. 21). But, as Hitzig remarks, if this be the meaning we must at least read וּבְכָלָה, with Bertholdt. Von Lengerke's objection that the idea of “destruction” is here out of place because the Jews were on the side of Antiochus, has no weight, for even if the Jews sided with Antiochus (as Josephus states), it is still possible that this clause may refer to the “destruction” of the Egyptian armies.

<sup>1</sup> “Antiochus enim volens Iudeam recuperare et Syriae urbes plurimas, Scopam ducem Ptolemaei juxta fontes Jordanis, ubi nunc Paneas condita est, inito certamine fugavit, et cum decem millibus armatorum obsedit clausum in Sidone. Ob quem liberandum misit Ptolemaeus duces inclytos Eropum et Menoclem et Damoxenum. Sed obsidionem solvere non potuit: donec fame superatus Scopas manus dedit et nudus cum sociis dimissus est”. Jerome, Comm. in Dan. xi. 15.

17—19. “And he shall set his face to come with the power of his whole kingdom, but he shall make an agreement with him” etc. Hävernick and Von Lengerke refer the suffix in מַלְכָותּו to Ptolemy, and accordingly explain, “He (i.e. Antiochus) shall set his face to come against the power of his (i.e. Ptolemy’s) whole kingdom”. But after the description of the utter defeat and helplessness of Ptolemy (v. 15, 16) it would be very unnatural to speak of “the power of his whole kingdom”. Ewald’s translation, “to come into possession of his kingdom”, assumes for the word פָּקֹד a sense which it bears nowhere else. It is therefore much more probable that the suffix in מַלְכָותּו refers to Antiochus (so Hitzig). The author seems to mean that after the conquest of all Syria, Antiochus determined to apply his strength to the conquest of Egypt itself, but thought it advisable, for the moment, to come to terms with Ptolemy. Instead of תִּשְׁעַן we should no doubt read תִּשְׁעַן (so Hitzig and others), according to the LXX. καὶ συνθήκας μετ’ αὐτοῦ ποιήσεται. יִשְׂרָאֵל is either a mistake for יִשְׂרָאֵל (see v. 6) or else a word of exactly the same meaning; in the latter case it would be a Plural of יִשְׂרָאֵל. The suffix in וְ must refer to Ptolemy. The latter half of v. 17 is obscure. “The daughter of women” seems to be Cleopatra, daughter of Antiochus, whom he betrothed and some years afterwards married to Ptolemy. With the singular phrase בַת הַנְּשָׁמָן Hitzig compares בָּתִי אֲחֻזּוֹת Zech. ix. 9. The LXX. has θυγατέρα ἀνθρώπου, the Pesh. בָּתִי נְגַדְּתָה, but whether this proves the existence of a reading may be doubted. The suffix in לְהַשְׁחִיתָה is referred by De Wette, Hävernick, and Von Lengerke, to מַלְכָותּו, i.e. “and he shall give to him (i.e. Ptolemy) the daughter of women, to destroy it (i.e. the Empire of Egypt)”. Von Lengerke supposes that the object of Antiochus, in giving his daughter in marriage, was to excite against Ptolemy the resentment of the Romans. But if means the kingdom of Antiochus, the suffix in לְהַשְׁחִיתָה must refer to Cleopatra herself, i.e. he will give her in marriage “to her ruin”. Perhaps, however, we should read לְהַשְׁחִיתָה (with Hitzig), i.e. “in order to work ruin”. The verbs פָּעַל and תִּהְיֶה should probably be taken impersonally (see Is. vii. 7), “but it shall not avail, nor shall he attain it (i.e. his object)". In v. 18 the Kethib יִשְׁבֶּן is preferable to the Keri מִשְׁבֵּן (LXX. καὶ δώσει) since it is a question, not of a purpose (as in v. 17), but of actual motion (as in v. 19). "And he shall turn his face towards the isles and shall take many" etc. מִזְמָרָן, as elsewhere, has the general sense of "lands by the sea". In the year 197 B.C. Antiochus made an expedition, by sea and land, against Asia Minor. For a while he met with great success; at length, in 190 B.C., he was severely defeated by the Roman general Lucius Scipio near Magnesia, and made peace on the most humiliating conditions. To this catastrophe the latter half of v. 18 probably alludes. Von Lengerke translates, "But a Commander shall put an end to his insults, nothing but his insults shall he repay to him". The first לו Von Lengerke explains as meaning "to his hurt" (cf. Jer. xlvi. 35. Ruth iv. 14).

The word קַצְחָה seems to be derived from (Ar. قصى "to decide", "to pronounce a legal sentence"), in which case the grammatical formation would be quite unique in Hebrew. As קַצְחָה is elsewhere used both of civil and military officials, it may well be applied here to Scipio. But the latter part of the verse presents great difficulties. Nowhere in the Old Testament does בְּלֹת mean "only", "nothing but" (Von Lengerke, Hitzig), and to appeal to Is. x. 4 is to elucidate the obscure by means of the more obscure. Equally unproven is the meaning "and moreover" (ausserdem dass), proposed by Hävernick. Graetz's emendation בְּלֹתִי, "on the cheek", is ingenious, but though "to smite on the cheek" is a familiar Hebrew metaphor (Micah iv. 14. Ps. iii. 8. Job xvi. 10), such a phrase as "to requite an insult upon the cheek" is unknown. Perhaps some help may here be derived from the LXX. which has καὶ ἐπιστρέψει ὄργὴν ὀνειδισμοῦ αὐτῶν ἐν ὅρκῳ κατὰ τὸν ὀνειδισμὸν αὐτοῦ ἐπιστρέψει [αὐτῷ· καὶ ἐπιστρέψει] τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ κ.τ.λ. The words in square brackets I have supplied from conjecture—their omission is easily explained by the homoioteleuton. Instead of והשִׁבְתִּין the translator appears to have read קַצְחָה, but here the Masoretic text is obviously preferable. In the words immediately following there is a wide divergence between the two texts. It is possible that the original reading may have been “שְׁבָעִים חֲרֵפָתוֹ יִשְׁבֶּל” “he shall requite his insults sevenfold”, cf. Ps. lxxix. 12. This hypothesis at least will account both for the present Masoretic text and for the variations of the LXX. לֹא בְּלַתִּי may have arisen out of שְׁבָעִים, since in some forms of the older alphabet ל and ב are little more than vertical strokes. On the other hand the LXX., in which the first ל is absent, may have confused שְׁבָעָה with σέπτα. Verse 19—“And he shall turn his face towards the strongholds of his (own) land, and shall be overthrown and fall and disappear”. After his discomfiture Antiochus retreated to the lands east of the Taurus, and was at length killed in the attempt to plunder the temple of Bel in Elymais.

20. This verse describes in a few words the reign of Seleucus Philopator, son of Antiochus the Great. The usual rendering is, “and there shall arise in his place one who shall cause an exactor to pass through the glory of the kingdom” etc., (so Von Lengerke). This is supposed to refer to the mission of Heliodorus for the purpose of robbing the Jewish Temple (II Macc. iii. 7), and by “the glory of the kingdom”, the author, it is said, means Judaea. With this view Hitzig substantially agrees, but he renders “towards the glory of the kingdom”, and explains חַדְרָה מֶלֶכִית to be Jerusalem. In either case the usage of Hebrew would require a preposition before חַדְרָה (cf. Zech. ix. 8). Moreover it would be very strange to call Judaea or Jerusalem the glory of a heathen kingdom, and in v. 21 evidently means “royal honour”. Since חַדְרָה and הַדְרָה are so frequently coupled together, we may assume that חַדְרָה מֶלֶכִית and הַדְרָה מֶלֶכִית express much the same idea, הַדְרָה being a mere phonetic variation of חַדְרָה. For these reasons Graetz inserts בְּלִי before הַדְרָה, “there shall arise one who shall cause an exactor to pass (through the land), without royal dignity” etc. But the words, without further specification, would be scarcely intelligible—not to mention the boldness of adding בְּלִי. It appears to me simpler and more satisfactory to read נוֹגֵשׁ מַעֲבֵיר instead of נוֹגֵשׁ מַעֲבֵיד, i.e. “And there shall arise in his place an exactor who shall cause the royal dignity to pass away” etc. For this use of חַאֲבֵיד see II Sam. xii. 13. Esth. viii. 3. The suffix in בְּנֵי naturally refers to Antiochus the Great. By the “exactor” would be meant Seleucus, who made himself unpopular by his avarice; Livy speaks of this king's reign as "otiosum, nullis admodum rebus gestis nobilitatum" (Bk. xli. 19). Such a prince, following immediately upon Antiochus the Great, might well be described as "causing the royal dignity to pass away". "And in a few days he shall be broken"; for יְמִים אֲחֵרִים cf. Gen. xxvii. 44; xxix. 20. "To be broken" is "to be ruined", not necessarily "to be slain" (cf. v. 26). Those who find in the preceding words an allusion to the mission of Heliodorus, generally explain the "few days" as the time which elapsed between that mission and the death of Seleucus. Rosenmüller thinks that the whole reign of Seleucus, which lasted 12 years, is here called "a few days", as contrasted with the much longer reign of Antiochus the Great. Perhaps the author may mean no more than that the fall of Seleucus will be sudden and unexpected. The last words of the verse are usually translated "but not in wrath (i.e. by open violence), nor in war". But for this we should expect נָגָף rather than נַפְשָׁם. Graetz plausibly suggests "in battle array", cf. Ezek. xvii. 21; xxxviii. 6, 9, etc. It has been already mentioned, in the Introduction to Chap. vii., that Seleucus Philopator is said to have been murdered, and that the author of Daniel seems to have attributed the murder to the intrigues of Antiochus Epiphanes, who at the time was on his way back from Rome to the East.

21—24. "And there shall arise in his place a contemptible man, upon whom they have not conferred royal dignity, but he shall come in unawares and shall seize the kingdom by guile." In the "contemptible man" all modern commentators recognize Antiochus Epiphanes, younger son of Antiochus the Great. The words וְלֹא גַּתְתָּנוּ חֹדֶם מִלְכִית are best understood as a relative clause, אֲשֶׁר being omitted; cf. Ps. xxii. 30, where וְנַפְשָׁו לֹא stands for נַפְשָׁו לֹא חַיה. The subject of גַּתְתָּנוּ is "men" in general (cf. I Kings i. 1, 2); for the phrase, see I Chr. xxix. 25. The meaning is that Antiochus Epiphanes had never been treated as heir apparent to the throne. On בְּשִׁלְוחָה and תְּלִקְלִקּוֹת, see pp. 31, 32. Verses 22—24, as we have seen, are understood by many, from Porphyry onwards, to refer to the campaigns of Antiochus against Egypt. This view is accepted by Von Lengerke, who explains v. 22, as follows—"And the overwhelming forces (lit. the arms of the flood, viz. the forces of Egypt) shall be overwhelmed from before him and shall be broken, and also an allied prince" (viz. Ptolemy Philometor, son and successor of Ptolemy Epiphanes). But since Egypt is nowhere expressly mentioned until we come to v. 25, it seems much more probable that vv. 22—24 describe events which took place in Syria during the first five years of Antiochus' reign, i.e. between 175 and 170 B.C. Moreover the phrase זְרֻשָׁת הַשְׂטָף would be a singularly inappropriate designation for the armies defeated by Antiochus—שׁוֹט שׁוֹט (Is. xxviii. 15), which is cited as a parallel, evidently describes a victorious army. Also the use of גִּנֵּיד בְּרִית, instead of בָּעֵל בְּרִיתוֹ (Gen. xiv. 13) or אִישׁ בְּרִיתוֹ (Obad. 7), is quite anomalous. I would therefore propose to read הַשְׂטָף, instead of הַשְׁׂפָט, and to render, "And forces shall be utterly overwhelmed before him, and shall be broken, and likewise a Prince of the Covenant". The word זְרֻשָׁת may be used absolutely, like וּרְשָׁם in v. 31, and in all probability refers to Heliodorus and the other domestic enemies whom Antiochus had to overcome at the beginning of his reign; מִזְקָרְמִיה corresponds to זְרֻשָׁת in the parallel passage, chap. vii. 8. The "Prince of the Covenant" seems to be the Jewish High Priest Onias III. (so Hitzig), who was deposed by Antiochus about 174 B.C., and some years afterwards murdered near Antioch (II Macc. iv. 33—36)<sup>1</sup>. On the term גִּנֵּיד, as applied to the High Priest, see chap. ix. 25. בְּרִית (here, as in v. 32, without the Article) is the "covenant" of God with Israel, and hence Israel itself as a religious community, cf. קָרְשׁ v. 30; similarly, in Syriac, kēyāmā "covenant" or kēyāmā kaddishā "holy covenant", is used for "the clergy" (see Hoffmann's Julianos der Abtrünnige, p. 62, line 5, and p. 63, line 25). Verse 23—"And from the time when they shall ally themselves with him he shall practise fraud, and shall rise and become strong with (but) few men". Thus all who ally themselves with Antiochus are outwitted. מִן is here used as

<sup>1</sup> According to II Macc. iv. 7—10, the deposition of Onias III. was due to his brother Jason (named originally Jesus, see Josephus, Antiq. XII. 5. 1),

who by bribing Antiochus obtained the High-Priesthood for himself. About 171 B.C. Jason was deposed in favour of a certain Menelaus.

in chap. ix. 25; the form הַחֲכָרִית, in which the abstract ending is added to the Infinitive, may be compared to הַשְׁמֹעָת Ezek. xxiv. 26, although in the latter case the vocalization is not above suspicion. The subject of הַחֲכָרִית is unexpressed, cf. Ps. xlvi. 4 “בְּאָמֵר אֶלְיָהוּ” “when they say to me”, for which v. 11 of the psalm has גַּוְעַד בְּאָמְרָם אֶלְיָהוּ. בְּשָׁלֹוח seems here to be used in the sense of עַם. The “few men” are the partisans of Antiochus, i.e. those by whose help he was able to rise to power (שְׁלָלָה וְעַצְם) and overcome his rivals. The word בְּשָׁלֹוח (v. 24) Von Lengerke connects with v. 23; מִשְׁמָנִי מִדְיָנִה he explains as referring to Lower Egypt, invaded by Antiochus. Ewald, following the Masoretic text, translates, “He shall come unawares even into the fattest provinces”—by which provinces Ewald understands Galilee. But to describe Lower Egypt or Galilee as “the fattest parts of a province” (קָדוּנָה Singular) would be a strange figure of speech; the phrase אֲבָבִיָּה אֲדָם (Is. xxix. 19), which Hitzig here cites, is no real parallel, since אֲדָם is a collective and cannot form a Plural. Graetz explains, “In peace and with the honourable men of the land he will present himself”—taking מִשְׁמָנִי according to Is. x. 16. Ps. lxxviii. 31. But even if we admit such a use of קָדוּנָה, why should this connection between Antiochus and “the honourable men” be specially mentioned? Perhaps we should read וּבְשָׁלֹוחָ בְּמִשְׁמָנִי גַּוְעַד “And by stealth he shall assail the mightiest men of (each) province”. For בָּאָה in the sense of “to come against”, “to attack”, see v. 30. This agrees moreover with chap. viii. 25, וּבְשָׁלֹוחָ יִשְׁחַית רְבִים מִשְׁמָנִי. The מִשְׁמָנִי קָדוּנָה are presumably included in the עָזִים of chap. viii. 24, i.e. the “many” foes whom Antiochus contrived to ruin. The following words describe his marvellous success—“And he shall do what his fathers have not done, nor the fathers of his fathers; spoil and plunder and riches shall he scatter among them, and against strongholds shall he devise his devices, but (it shall be only) for a time”. The root בָּוּר appears nowhere else in the Old Testament but Ps. lxviii. 31. The suffix in לָהֶם is referred by Von Lengerke, Hitzig, and Ewald to the מִשְׁמָנִי קָדוּנָה, i.e. to the inhabitants of the regions in question, but if the מִשְׁמָנִי קָדוּנָה are the enemies of Antiochus, the suffix in לָהֶם must refer to his adherents; this vague use of the Plural is particularly common in Daniel (e.g. מִבְּנָה v. 7, יְמִינָה v. 25). By the "strongholds" we should probably understand the frontier of Egypt; it is here a question, not of invasion, but merely of ambitious plotting (cf. I Macc. i. 16 καὶ ὑπέλαβε βασιλεῦσαι τῆς Αἰγύπτου). This state of things, however, is to last only for a time.

25—28. These four verses describe the war of Antiochus against Ptolemy Philometor in 170 B.C. “And he shall rouse his might and his courage against the king of the South, with a great army; and the king of the South shall engage in the war with an army great and numerous exceedingly, but he (i.e. Ptolemy) shall not stand, for they shall devise devices against him”. For this use of וְ cf. Ps. lxxviii. 38. The “king of the South” in this verse is supposed by Hitzig to be Ptolemy Euergetes II. (commonly known by the nickname Φύσκων, younger brother of Ptolemy Philometor), who in the course of this war was proclaimed king at Alexandria<sup>1</sup>. But since the “two kings” in v. 27 are certainly Antiochus and Ptolemy Philometor, it may be assumed that also in vv. 25, 26, Ptolemy Philometor is meant<sup>2</sup>. In spite of his great resources, Ptolemy could not maintain the contest, owing to the treachery of his adherents (חַשְׁבָּיו עַלֵּי) (מִתְּחַשְׁבָּהוֹת). He was defeated by Antiochus near Pelusium, and at length fell into the power of the Syrian king. This is further explained in what follows (v. 26) “And those who eat of his dainties shall ruin him, and his army shall be swept away, and many shall fall down slain”. By “those who eat of his dainties” (cf. chap. i. 5) are meant the courtiers of Ptolemy, perhaps in particular Eulaeus and Lenaeus, two men who, after the death of his mother Cleopatra (about 174 B.C.), had complete influence over him (see Polybius xxviii. 21, and Jerome on Dan. xi. 21 ff.). Instead of וְאֶתְּנָשָׂרְתִּי we should probably read וְאֶתְּנָשָׂרְתִּי, according to v. 22. In v. 27, Ptolemy is in the hands of Antiochus.

<sup>1</sup> “Αρχει μὲν γὰρ ὁ Φιλομήτωρ πρότερος ἔτεσιν ἔνδεκα μύνος. Ἀντιθέου δὲ ἐπιστρατεύσαντος Αἰγύπτῳ καὶ πεμπλόντος αὐτὸν τὸ διάδημα, οἱ Ἀλεξανδρεῖς τῷ νεωτέρῳ ἐπέτρεψαν τὰ πράγματα, καὶ διώξαντες Ἀντίοχον ἐρρύσαντο τὸν Φιλομήτορα” κ.τ.λ. Porphyry, quoted by Eusebius in his Chronicle, ed. Schoene,

I. p. 162.

<sup>2</sup> A commentary on this passage is furnished by I Macc. i. 18, 19—the author of I Macc. here speaks of one Ptolemy only (i.e. Philometor), ignoring Physcon altogether, which confirms the interpretation given above.

“And as for the two kings, their minds (shall be bent) on mischief, and at one table they shall speak lies, but it shall not avail, for there is yet a limit (fixed) for the time”. After the defeat of the Egyptians, Antiochus allied himself with Ptolemy Philometor, on the pretext of helping him against his younger brother (who, as we have seen, was now reigning at Alexandria); but the league was a hollow pretence—while feasting together, each was planning the ruin of the other. עַתָּה, pausal form of עַתָּה, is an abstract noun from the root עָתָה, cf. סְבִבָּה קָסֶב from סְבִבָּה. The subject of תְּזִלָּה is indefinite, cf. מִצְמָר and תְּחִיָּה in v. 17. The “time” (מִזְמָר) is the time during which Antiochus is suffered to domineer over Egypt. Whether he was driven out or left of his own accord, v. 28 does not tell us. “And he shall return to his land with great riches, and his mind (shall be set) against the Holy Covenant; so he shall do (his will) and return to his land”. On his march northwards, Antiochus found Jerusalem in a state of tumult. A report had gone forth that he was dead, in consequence of which Jason, the deposed High Priest, had seized the opportunity to reinstate himself by force, and had massacred many of the partisans of his rival Menelaus (II Macc. v. 5). Antiochus, not unnaturally, regarded this as a rebellion against his royal authority, entered Jerusalem with his army, and put great numbers of Jews to death. He then marched to Antioch, carrying with him the spoils of the Temple (I Macc. i. 20–24. II Macc. v. 11–21).

29, 30. “At the time appointed he shall return and enter into the South, but it shall not be in the latter time as in the former time. And there shall come against him ships from Kittim, so shall he be cowed, and shall return and be wroth against the Holy Covenant, and shall do (his will), and return and have regard unto them who forsake the Holy Covenant”. In the spring of 168 B.C. Antiochus again invaded Egypt. Ptolemy Philometor and his brother, who at this time were reigning conjointly, had already despatched embassies to Achaia and to Rome, to ask for help against the Syrians (Polybius xxix. 23. Livy XLIV. 19; XLV. 11). On this occasion Antiochus fared much worse than before—the latter expedition was not as the former one. For the construction קָרְאָשָׁנָה וּקְאָתְרוֹנָה cf. Josh. xiv.

11. Ezek. xviii. 4. The phrase צַדִּיקִים קָפִיטִים, in which קָפִיטִים is, of course, an adjective, seems to have been suggested by Numb. xxiv. 24. Originally קָפִיטִים meant the inhabitants of Cyprus, but among the later Jews it was used for all the western maritime countries (I Macc. i. 1; viii. 5. Josephus, Antiq. i. 6. 1). The allusion here is to the Romans, who sent Caius Popilius Laenas to Egypt, summarily demanding that Antiochus should quit the country. The king, thoroughly humiliated, was forced to obey<sup>1</sup>. The Niphal נִקְרָאָה is from a root which occurs frequently in Syriac, but which appears nowhere else in the Old Testament except in Ps. cix. 16 and possibly in Ezck. xiii. 22. Job xxx. 8. The double בָּשֵׁב in v. 30 is taken by Von Lengerke in an adverbial sense, i.e. “and he shall again be wroth”—“and he shall again have regard”; but, as Hitzig remarks, the first בָּשֵׁב probably refers to the march of Antiochus from Egypt towards Judaea, the second בָּשֵׁב to his march from Judaea towards Antioch. Whether Antiochus, after leaving Egypt, came in person to Jerusalem, is not clear, for I Macc. i. 29, which describes the events of this time, speaks only of an official sent by the king with an army. But it is certain that in the autumn of 168 B.C. Jerusalem was plundered by the king’s order, many Jews were slain, and a systematic attempt was begun to suppress the Jewish religion. For the use of נִשְׁעָן cf. יְהוָה מִלְּאָנָה chap. viii. 24. “He shall have regard unto them who γάρ πρὸ χειρῶν ἀμπελίνην περιέγραφε τῷ κλήματι τὸν Ἀντίοχον, ἐν τούτῳ τε τῷ γύρῳ τὴν ἀπόφασιν ἐκέλευσε δοῦναι περὶ τῶν γεγραμμένων. δὲ βασιλεὺς ἔνιστθεις τὸ γινόμενον καὶ τὴν ὑπεροχήν, βραχὺν χρόνον ἐναπορήσας ἔφη τοιστοιν πάν τὸ παρακαλούμενον ὑπὸ Ῥωμαίων. οἱ δὲ περὶ τὸν Ποπλίον τέτε τὴν δεξιὰν αὐτοῦ λαμβάνοντες ἀμα πάντες ἡσπάζοντο φιλοφρόνως. ἦν δὲ τὰ γεγραμμένα λίγεις εἰς αὐτῆς τὸν πρὸς Πτολεμαῖον πόλεμον. διὸ καὶ δοθεισῶν αὐτῷ τακτῶν ἡμερῶν οὗτος μὲν ἀπῆγε τὰς δυνάμεις εἰς τὴν Συρίαν, βαρυνόμενος μὲν καὶ στένων, ἐκὼν δὲ τοῖς καιροῖς κατὰ τὸ παρόν”. Polybius xxix. 27. The last words strikingly correspond to Dan. xi. 30.

<sup>1</sup> “Οτι τοῦ Ἀντίοχου πρὸς Πτολεμαῖον ἔνεκεν τοῦ Πηλούσιον κατασχεῖν ἀφικομένου, δὲ Ποπλίος δὲ τῶν Ῥωμαίων στρατηγός, τοῦ βασιλέως πόρρωθεν ἀσπαζομένου διὰ τῆς φωνῆς καὶ τὴν δεξιὰν προτείνοντος, πρόχειρον ἔχων τὸ δελτάριον, ἐν φέτῳ τῆς συγκλήτου δύγμα κατατάκτω, προύτενεν αὐτῷ, καὶ τοῦτ’ ἐκέλευε πρῶτον ἀναγνῶναι τὸν Ἀντίοχον, ὃς μὲν ἐμοὶ δοκεῖ, μὴ πρότερον ἀξιώσας τὸ τῆς φίλας σύνθημα ποιεῖν τὸν δεξιούμενον, πότερα φίλοις ἢ πολέμοις ἔστιν. ἐπειδὲ δὲ βασιλεὺς ἀναγνοῦς ἔφη βούλεσθαι μεταδοῦναι τοῖς φίλοις ὑπὲρ τῶν προσπεπτωκότων, ἀκούσας δὲ Ποπλίος ἐποίησε πρᾶγμα βαρὺ μὲν δοκοῦν εἶναι καὶ τελέως ὑπερήφανον ἔχων

forsake the Holy Covenant", i.e. he will henceforth fix his attention upon the apostate Jews, and in every way further their designs (cf. v. 37, also Job xxxi. 1).

31. "And forces sent by him shall prevail, and they shall desecrate the sanctuary, the stronghold, and abolish the daily sacrifice, and set up the abomination". שָׁמַרְיָה is rendered by Von Lengerke, "shall arise", i.e. shall be set on foot, and by Hitzig "shall remain", i.e. shall be left to garrison the fortresses of Judaea, after the departure of Antiochus. But the analogy of vv. 15, 25, is in favour of the meaning "shall prevail". The desecration of the Temple was the work of the Syrian soldiery, abetted by a party among the Jews. תִּשְׁעַתְהָרֶן is in apposition to שְׁקָדֵם—both before and after this period the Temple at Jerusalem appears to have had fortifications. As to the precise date of the abolition of the daily sacrifice, I Maccabees tells us nothing; but we are informed that on the 15th of Chislev, i.e. near the end of December, 168 B.C., a heathen altar was built upon the stone platform which in the post-exilic Temple served as the place of sacrifice (I Macc. i. 54; cf. iv. 42–47). Ten days later, i.e. on the 25th of Chislev, sacrifices were offered on the new altar. According to II Macc. vi. 2, the Temple was at this time dedicated to the Olympian Zeus. Hence almost all commentators are agreed in explaining "the abomination" (γνωστόν) to be the heathen altar mentioned above. But as to the term מְשֻׁבֵּט there has been considerable difference of opinion. As it is impossible to draw any conclusion from the corrupt passages viii. 13 and ix. 27, we must be guided chiefly by chap. xii. 11, where we read of a מְשֻׁבֵּט γνωστόν. The oldest exegetical tradition on the subject is that contained in the LXX. which has βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως (chap. xi. 31) and τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως (chap. xii. 11). The phrase βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως is used also in I Macc. i. 54, and seems to have been borrowed from Daniel—whether from chap. xi. 31 or chap. xii. 11 it is impossible to say. This does not prove that מְשֻׁבֵּט and מְשֻׁבֵּט were used as abstract nouns, but only that they were connected with the idea of desolation. Most modern commentators translate מְשֻׁבֵּט "desolating", and explain מְשֻׁבֵּט in chap. xii. 11 as an equivalent form. But a Poel מְשֻׁבֵּט "to desolate" is not known to exist. Hitzig interprets both שָׁמֶם and שְׁמֵם as “an object of horror”, but without any valid proof. Great light seems to me to have been thrown on this question by Nestle, in the Zeitschrift für alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, 1883. He thinks that שְׁמֵם is an intentional disfigurement of שְׁקִין (in בַּעַל־שְׁמֵם or בַּעַל־שָׁמֶם, in Aramaic בַּעַל־שָׁמֵן), the Semitic equivalent of the Greek Ζεύς<sup>1</sup>. The only objection which can be raised against Nestle’s theory is that in Daniel שְׁמֵם שְׁקִין means, not the god, but the altar of the god. This however is of no great consequence, for when once the phrase was formed it might easily be applied to everything connected with the worship of Zeus, just as among the later Jews עֲבוֹדָה זָרָה meant either “idolatry” or “an idol”. If therefore שְׁקִין שָׁמֶם is a term coined in order to connect the worship of בַּעַל־שְׁמֵם with the idea of “desolation” (ἐρήμωσις), it must appear very unlikely that the author of Daniel used שָׁמֶם and שְׁמֵם indifferently. It is at least remarkable that in both passages where שְׁמֵם (משומם) occurs, it produces a syntactical construction which, if not impossible, is at all events open to grave suspicion, for in chap. ix. 27 we should expect מְשׁוֹמְטִים and in chap. xi. 31 הַמְשֻׁמָּם. On the whole the most probable hypothesis is that in chap. ix. 27 שְׁמֵם is an error, and that in the verse before us שָׁמֶם was inserted by a scribe who wished to assimilate the two passages.

32—35. “And those who bring guilt upon the Covenant he shall make apostates by treacherous means, but a company who know their God shall be valiant and do exploits. And the teachers of the people shall give understanding to the multitude, and they shall fall by sword and by flame, by captivity and by spoil (many) days. And when they are falling they shall be holpen with a little help, and many shall join themselves unto them—treacherously. But (when) certain of the teachers shall fall, (it shall be) in order to purge them and cleanse and make white, until the time of the end, for it is yet for the time appointed". מְרַשֵּׁשִׁ בָּרִית is usually rendered "those that sin against the Covenant" (Ewald). Von Lengerke translates "die Frevler des Bundes", i.e. the sinners among the covenanted people, and Hitzig "those who condemn (i.e. renounce) the Covenant". But it is more natural to suppose that the verb, מְרַשֵּׁשִׁ בָּרִית, "those who bring guilt upon the covenanted people", stand in opposition to the subject of chap. xii. 3. The subject of the verb חַנֵּן is, of course, Antiochus. Those Jews who already had leanings towards heathenism he induced by specious promises (בְּחַלְקֹות) openly to apostatize from the religion of Israel (see I Macc. ii. 18). Elsewhere in the Old Testament חַנֵּן is "to defile" the earth with bloodshed etc. (Numb. xxxv. 33. Jer. iii. 2); here the object is personal. חַלְקֹות evidently has the same meaning as חַלְקָה (vv. 21, 34); if the pointing be correct, it is formed like קָה, but elsewhere we find חַלְקָה (Is. xxx. 10. Ps. xii. 3, 4). In contrast to the apostate Jews stand those "who know their God", i.e. those who have a practical knowledge of His ways (Jer. ix. 23). סָמֵעַ is not in the construct state, but in apposition to אֱלֹהִים, cf. Ps. xcv. 10. Ezek. iii. 5. The suffix in אֱלֹהִים refers to סָמֵעַ (Jer. vii. 28). In v. 33 is rendered by some "the wise of the people" (so Von Lengerke), as also הַמְשִׁכִּילִים in v. 35 and chap. xii. 3, 10. Ewald and Hitzig translate by "teachers", according to chap. ix. 22. The probability is that the author uses סָמֵעַ in a double sense, i.e. it includes both the possession of wisdom and the imparting of it; similarly יְבִין is here active, "shall give understanding", whereas in the parallel passage, chap. xii. 10, we have to render "shall understand". In any case it is clear that a special class, or rather party, is here meant, viz. the leaders of the anti-Hellenistic movement, who were known as the "pious" (תַּפְסִירִים, see I Macc. ii. 42; vii. 13. II Macc. xiv. 6). Around these enthusiasts gathered a great multitude of their co-religionists, who till then had been halting between two opinions. The subject of נְבָשֶׁלֶת may be either the רְגִים (Hitzig) or the מִשְׁפֵּילִים (Von Lengerke). The latter is perhaps the more probable view, as those who “fall” in v. 33 must be identical with those to whom “many join themselves” in v. 34. That the verb נָכַל does not imply the extermination of the מִשְׁפֵּילִים is obvious from what follows. The “little help” (v. 34), in the midst of adversity, refers doubtless to the first successes of the pious party, headed by Mattathias (I Macc. ii. 42–48), before any of the great battles had been fought. The ruthless severity which “the pious” displayed, produced its natural effect—many joined them from mere terror and were ready at any moment to turn traitors. Verse 35 should probably be taken as an explanation of what precedes. בְּנֵי לְאַזְרוֹן בְּנֵם is literally “to purge amongst them”, i.e. to perform a purifying process in their midst. The suffix in בְּנֵם, to judge by chap. xii. 10, must refer to the people at large, not only to the מִשְׁפֵּילִים; the meaning therefore seems to be that the death of some of “the teachers” is no excuse for despair, but is necessary in order that their adherents, “the many”, may be duly tested. לְלֵבָן, if correctly pointed, is a contraction of לְהַלְבָּן, which again stands for חַלְבֵּין (cf. Deut. xxxii. 8, for חַנְחִילֵין); similar are לְשֵׁשׁ Deut. xxvi. 12 and Neh. x. 39. But more probably we should read לְלֵבָן, with Hitzig. The Piel of לְבָן does not indeed occur in the Old Testament (for from Ps. ix. 1, to which Hitzig appeals, no conclusion can be drawn), but is common in post-Biblical Hebrew.

<sup>1</sup> In addition to the proofs given by Nestle may be mentioned a passage of Philo of Byblus, cited by Eusebius (Praep. Evang. I. 10. 7), “Τοῦτον γὰρ Θεὸν ἐνδιέμενον μόνον οὐρανοῦ κύριον, Βεελ-σαμὴν καλοῦντες, δὲ ἔστι παρὰ Φοινίκης κύριος οὐρανοῦ, Ζεὺς δὲ παρ’ Ἑλλήσι”. Moreover in a bilingual Palmyrene inscription of the year 134 A.D. the words לְבַעַל־שָׁמֵן מְרָא עַל־מְאָה are rendered by

Δαι μεγιστῷ κεραυνῷ (see Z. D. M. G. xv. p. 16, and De Vogüé, Syrie Centrale, p. 50, note). How easily the play upon the word שְׁמֵם might occur to a Jew is shewn by a passage in the בְּרָאָשִׁית רְכָב (sect. 4, near the end), where the sky is said to be called שְׁמֵם because people are astonished at it (שְׁהָרָיוֹת מְשֻׁחָמִים עַלְיהָ).

36—39. “And the king shall do according to his own will, and shall exalt and magnify himself above every god, and against the God of gods shall he speak monstrous things; so shall he prosper until the wrath is over, for a sentence hath been executed. And to the gods of his fathers he shall have no regard, nor to the Desire of women, nor shall he have regard to any god, but shall magnify himself above all”. After describing the sufferings of the faithful Israelites, the angel returns to the subject of Antiochus, who is called, not “the king of the North”, but “the king” simply. The portrait of Antiochus here given, as one who “magnifies himself above every god”, and who “has no regard to the gods of his fathers”, certainly does not appear at first sight to agree with the accounts of the western historians;

both Polybius and Livy speak with admiration of the honour which Antiochus paid to the gods. We must, however, remember that though he acquired a reputation for piety among the Greeks by his splendid presents to temples etc., his conduct may have produced a very different impression upon his Oriental subjects, both heathens and Jews. Indeed Polybius himself tells us that men differed greatly in their opinion of the king's character—some thinking him a good-natured easy-going man, others a maniac (Fragm. of Bk. xxvi.). His waywardness and his contempt for established customs were peculiarly calculated to shock Oriental conservatism. When to this we add his persecution of the Jews, it is not surprising that in Daniel he should be represented as a marvel of impiety. “The God of gods” (v. 36) is the God of Israel, cf. יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵינוּ chap. ii. 47. The phrase יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵינוּ is borrowed from Is. x. 25. On יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵינוּ see chap. ix. 26, 27. The Perfect יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵינוּ expresses certainty, i.e. the sentence of punishment must first have been executed before the divine wrath (מִשְׁפָט) is over. In v. 37, “the gods of his fathers” are the deities whose worship was officially recognized in the Seleucid Empire. In what manner Antiochus shewed his disrespect for “the gods of his fathers” we are not here told, but it is by no means improbable that his attempts to centralize his empire by the abolition of local usages (see I Macc. i. 41, 42) may have spread the notion that he despised all established religions. “The Desire of women” must, to judge by the context, be some object of worship. Most modern interpreters, following Ephraim Syrus, explain this as a reference to the goddess Nanaia, whose temple in Elymais the king endeavoured to plunder shortly before his death<sup>1</sup>. But to this view there are two objections. Firstly, the attack upon the temple of Nanaia cannot have been heard of in Judaea till the year 164 B.C. Secondly, there is no reason why Nanaia should be designated as the Desire of women. Even if her worship was, as has been supposed, of a voluptuous character, this would scarcely give rise to such an appellation. It appears therefore much more probable that Ewald is right in explaining the Desire of women as Tammuz (Adonis), whose cult had been popular in Syria from time immemorial, especially amongst women (Ezek. viii. 14). The meaning of v. 38 is doubtful. Von Lengerke interprets, “But the god of strongholds shall he honour upon his pedestal, and a god whom his fathers have not known shall he honour with gold and with silver and with precious stones and with costly things”. The “god of strongholds” and the “god whom his fathers have not known” Von Lengerke takes to be designations of Jupiter Capitolinus, in whose honour Antiochus began to erect a temple, profusely adorned with gold, at Antioch (Livy xli. 20). But why should it be mentioned that Antiochus honoured Jupiter “upon his pedestal”? It is decidedly preferable to translate עַל־בָּבוֹן “instead thereof” (with Gesenius), the suffix referring to בָּל in the preceding verse, cf. vv. 20, 21—the meaning “instead” is the only one which will suit all three passages. But as to אֱלֹהִים מְשֻׁנִּים there has been much difference of opinion. The Peshitta has ~~אֱלֹהִים~~ ~~אֱלֹהִים~~ “a mighty god”. Some moderns (e.g. Keil) have thought that “the god of strongholds” is War personified. Hitzig reads בָּעֵן instead of מְשֻׁנִּים, and interprets as follows—“But the god of the stronghold of the sea (i.e. the Tyrian god Melkart, see Is. xxiii. 4, where בָּעֵן means Tyre) shall he honour in his place (i.e. in his temple at Tyre)”. But by “the god whom his fathers have not known” Hitzig understands Jupiter Capitolinus. The obscurity of this passage may be due to the fact that the author is alluding to some report which was current among the Jews but which perhaps had little real foundation. The beginning of v. 39, as it stands in the Masoretic text, is quite unintelligible, for to translate, “And he shall act towards the strong fortresses as towards the strange god” (Ewald), or “And so shall he act towards the strong fortresses, together with strange gods” (Von Lengerke) is unnatural in the extreme. Probably we should read בְּעֵן instead of בְּעֵן, with Hitzig, so that the sense will be, “And he shall procure for the strong fortresses the people of a strange god”, referring to the fact that Antiochus settled heathen colonists in the fortified cities of Judaea, especially in Jerusalem (I Macc. iii. 36, 45). For this use of שָׁבֵח see II Sam. xv. 1. I Kings i. 5, and with גָּבָר אֲלֹהִים cf. Numb. xxi. 24.

<sup>1</sup> See Polybius xxxi. 11 where this goddess is called Artemis, and Appian, Syr. 60, where she is identified with Aphrodite.

ment, would be natural. He goes forth (from Egypt) to destroy and to exterminate many. “And he shall plant his palace-tents between the seas and the glorious holy mountain; so shall he come to his end, and none shall help him”. אַפְדָן, in Syriac āphadhnā, is from the Old Persian apadāna “palace”<sup>1</sup>. “The tents of his palace” are the tents which form his head-quarters. מִם יָמִים is here, as in Judg. v. 17, equivalent to הַיּוֹם, i.e. the Mediterranean. Thus Antiochus will encamp between the sea and Jerusalem (חַר אָבִי קָרְנֵשׁ). The notion of some commentators, e.g. Hävernick, that by the “seas” are meant the Caspian Sea and the Persian Gulf, and by the “glorious holy mountain” the temple of Nanaia in Elymais, may be dismissed at once, for how could a strict Jew designate a heathen temple as אָבִי קָרְנֵשׁ? Von Lengerke and Hitzig, while fully admitting that the beginning of v. 45 describes Antiochus as encamped in Palestine, suppose that in the latter half of the verse the author suddenly passes on (overleaping several years) to relate the death of Antiochus in Persia; they therefore explain וְבָא עַד־קָרְנוֹן as meaning, “And he shall go (into Persia) to meet his end”. But by this hypothesis the first half of the verse is deprived of all meaning. What connection can there be between the fact that Antiochus encamped in Palestine in 168 B.C. and the fact that he “came to his end” in Persia four years later? It is much more reasonable to assume that the author describes the king as encamping in Palestine because it is in Palestine that he is to “come to his end”. That Palestine, the scene of his greatest crimes, should also be the scene of his final overthrow, was, from the point of view of the persecuted Jews, a very natural expectation. No details are here given, but since in chap. viii. 25 we read that Antiochus will “be broken without hand”, we must suppose that the author looked forward to some divine intervention by which the great enemy would perish “with none to help him.”

xii. 1—3. The opening words of v. 1, “And at that time”,

<sup>1</sup> The Arab. fadan is, of course, a loan-word. See Nöldeke, Beiträge zur Kenntniss der Poesie der alten Araber, p. 138—Fadanun yutifū bihi-n-Nabiṣu muraffa‘ū, “a lofty palace which Nabateans encompass”, i.e. such as Syrians inhabit.

clearly shew that what follows will take place at the time of the overthrow of Antiochus. Michael, the guardian angel of Israel (chap. x. 13), will arise to defend the Saints. The precise nature of the coming time of affliction is left undetermined, but, as has been before remarked, the author of Daniel probably looked forward to a gathering together of the heathen nations against Jerusalem (Zech. xiv. 2 ff.). The conception of a great battle in which the assembled Gentile powers are to be defeated, appears elsewhere both in Jewish and Christian apocalypses (Enoch xc. 16. Rev. xvi. 14; xix. 19). With the words, “And there shall be a time of affliction” etc., cf. Jer. xxx. 7. By קָרְבָּן “thy people” is meant, of course, the true Israel, “all who are found written in the book”. The metaphor of a “book”, in which the names of the righteous are inscribed, occurs also in Exod. xxxii. 32. Ps. lxix. 29. cf. Mal. iii. 16. Verse 2 introduces the resurrection of the dead. To what extent this belief existed among the Jews in pre-Maccabean times, cannot here be discussed, but this is in any case the earliest passage where the belief is unambiguously set forth. Here, however, the resurrection is far from being universal; it includes “many”, not all, of the dead. That only Israelites are raised is not expressly stated, but appears probable from the context. The phrase עֲרָמִת שָׁפֵךְ is very peculiar; we should expect rather עֲרָמִת קָרְבָּן<sup>1</sup>. Those who awake are divided into two classes, corresponding to the division in chap. xi. 32. חַיִּים שָׁוֹלְם “everlasting life”, like the חַיִּים עַל-אָמֶן of the Targums (Lev. xviii. 5. Ezek. xx. 13), evidently means individual immortality, and is thus distinguished from the perpetual existence of Israel (cf. Ecclesiasticus xxxvii. 25; xliv. 13). The wicked who are raised will be objects of reproach and abhorrence for ever. דָּרָאָן, constr. of נָגָרָאָן, seems to have been suggested by Is. lxvi. 24, the only other passage where the word is found. As to תְּמִשְׁלָיִם (v. 3) see what has been said on chap. xi. 33. Here, as before, “the teachers” are distinguished or urām). If this were so, we might read אֲרָמִות שָׁפֵךְ in Daniel. But the word in question has not hitherto been found in Hebrew or Aramaic.

<sup>1</sup> It has been suggested to me by Prof. Robertson Smith that in Ps. xlix. 12 אֲרָמִות may be a corruption of אֲרָמוֹת “cairns” (Arab. irām, Pl. ārām

from the rest of the faithful Israelites—they not only live for ever but are eternally glorified. הַנְּהִיר “splendour” occurs also in Ezek. viii. 2; the verb הַנְּהִיר “to shine” is found nowhere else in the Old Testament, but the root זָהָר often has this sense in the Aramaic dialects and in Arabic. Whether the Biblical הַנְּהִיר “to warn” comes from the same root, does not seem certain, though it is generally assumed<sup>1</sup>. “Those that justify the multitude” are apparently identical with “the teachers”. For the phrase, see Is. liii. 11. As to the meaning of “justification” cf. the Mishnah, Ābōth v. 26, 27, “If a man makes the many righteous, sin cannot prevail over him, but if a man makes the many to sin, he is deprived of the power of repentance. Moses was righteous and made the many righteous, and the righteousness of the many depended upon him” משֵׁה זָכָה וַיַּכְהֶב אֶת הָרְבִים תְּלוּיה בָּו, etc.

4. As in chap. viii. 26, the vision ends with an express command to “hide” the revelation. By הַקְּפָר “the book” are meant all the revelations that have been made to Daniel (so Hitzig); see chap. vii. 1. It is quite gratuitous to suppose, with Hävernick and Von Lengerke, that “the book” includes only the last vision, for no reason can be given why this vision should be more carefully concealed than the others. It may indeed be asked by what means Daniel could prevent the unsealing of the book before “the time of the end”, but the difficulty, however obvious to us, did not necessarily occur to the author’s contemporaries. In their eyes the passage would satisfactorily account for their previous unacquaintance with the work. The latter half of the verse is extremely difficult. Of the word יַשְׁטַח there are two common interpretations, “many shall wander to and fro” (Von Lengerke), and “many shall peruse the book” (Hitzig, Ewald). According to the former view, the phrase refers to the difficulties of the prophecy; it was only means “to divert” a person from a path of danger (II Kings vi. 10. Ezek. iii. 18), and the common נָזַר “to beware of”, in Syriac. Hence might be derived the more general sense of “teaching” (Exod. xviii. 20).

<sup>1</sup> Possibly הַנְּהִיר “to warn” may be ultimately connected with the root זָהָר “to turn aside from the way”, which is common to Hebrew and Arabic—cf. the roots נָזַר and נָזַר, פָּרַע and פָּרַע, הַנְּהִיר and הַנְּהִיר. This would explain why

after many generations had been perplexed by it that its true sense would be understood (וַתִּרְבֶּה הָרֻעָה). According to the latter view, which is the more popular, שְׁטֹטֵת refers to the zeal with which the book would be studied. But neither view agrees with the other passages in which שְׁטֹטֵת is used (Jer. v. 1. Amos viii. 12. Zech. iv. 10. II Chr. xvi. 9). The verb seems always to denote rapid motion, and especially motion hither and thither. Everywhere else the motion is meant in a literal sense, and it is therefore very bold to apply it to "mental perplexity" or the "perusal" of a book. And how do the above interpretations agree with the beginning of the verse? It is natural to suppose that the clause which follows the words "Seal the book till the time of the end" will explain the reason of the command, just as in chap. viii. 26 the angel adds בַּיִם נָקִים. That in the present case the particle בַּיִם is omitted, proves nothing to the contrary—cf. for example, אַל-פְּנֵיךְ אַנְּשָׁנָה עֲזָבָה Is. xli. 13 with the parallel passage Is. xlvi. 1. But to say "Seal the book—many are to peruse it", or "Seal the book—many are to be perplexed by it", would be altogether meaningless. The most probable solution of the difficulty is to be found in the LXX., which instead of וְהַרְבֵּה הָרֻעָה has καὶ πλησθῆ ἡ γῆ ἀδικίας, i.e. "and many shall be the calamities". For the use of the verb in the feminine singular with the subject in the feminine plural, see Is. xxxiv. 13. Jer. iv. 14. Zech. vi. 14. Neh. xiii. 10. This reading appears to be signally confirmed by I Macc. i. 9, where it is said of the successors of Alexander (i.e. with reference to the very period which the author of Daniel has here in view) καὶ ἐπλήθυναν κακὰ ἐν τῇ γῇ "and they multiplied evils in the earth"<sup>1</sup>. That the author of I Maccabees elsewhere quotes the book of Daniel is generally admitted, and even if we hesitate to regard I Macc. i. 9 as a quotation, it shews at all events with what feelings the

<sup>1</sup> Perhaps the original Hebrew text of I Macc. had יְרַבֵּו הָרֻעָה, which may be read יְרַבֵּו καὶ ἐπλήθυναν—but also יְרַבֵּו, which would make the resemblance to Daniel even closer. It is remarkable that in the 1st chapter of

I Macc. there are several other passages which seem to be reminiscences of the latter part of Daniel, cf. v. 15 with Dan. xi. 30, v. 17 with Dan. xi. 40, v. 18 with Dan. xi. 26.

Jews looked back upon the period in question. The meaning of the verse would therefore seem to be, “And do thou, Daniel, hide the words and seal the book till the time of the end—many shall rush hither and thither, and many shall be the calamities”, i.e. the revelation must remain concealed, because there is to ensue a long period of commotion and distress.

5—7. The speech of the angel is now ended, and Daniel perceives two figures, doubtless angels also, standing on opposite banks of the Tigris, which is here called, not חַנְנָר as in chap. x. 4, but חַיָּאָר (see p. 32). Why two angels are here introduced, is explained by v. 7, since for an oath, as for any other fact, two witnesses are necessary (Deut. xix. 15). In v. 6 it is very doubtful who is the speaker. That “the man clothed in linen” is identical with the being described in chap. x. 5, 6, cannot be questioned. His position “above the waters of the river” agrees with chap. viii. 16, where an angelic voice speaks from “between (the banks of the) Ulai”. Von Lengerke, as we have seen, identifies with Gabriel the being who brings his speech to an end in v. 4, and he supposes that Gabriel is also the speaker in v. 6. The view of Hitzig, viz. that the angel who has been speaking previously is “the man clothed with linen”, and that the speaker in v. 6 is one of the two angels mentioned in v. 5, appears, upon the whole, more probable. We should indeed have expected, in this case, יִאֱמֹר אֶחָד מֵהֶם, or some such phrase, instead of the simple וַיֹּאמֶר, but the use of a verb or suffix without any distinct indication of the person referred to is found elsewhere in Daniel. The reading of the LXX. καὶ εἶπα, οὐαὶ, has not the appearance of genuineness, for the analogy of chap. viii. 13 favours the view that it is an angel, not Daniel, who asks the question, “How long (will it be till) the end of the marvels?” By תְּפִלָּות “the marvels” are meant the events which have been foretold (cf. Is. xxix. 14), as is evident from the oath which follows in v. 7. The lifting up of the hand in swearing is mentioned in Gen. xiv. 22. Exod. vi. 8; here both hands are lifted for the sake of greater emphasis. The angel swears “by Him who liveth for ever” (cf. עַל־צְדָקָתְךָchap. iv. 31) that the end will come “after a time, times, and half (a time)”, i.e. after three years and a half; see chap. vii. 25. In

לְפָנֶיךָ the prep. ל expresses the idea of limitation, cf. שָׁבַע הַיּוֹם, “after the seven days”, Gen. vii. 10. The three years and a half begin with the abolition of the daily sacrifice (see v. 11). To the author of Daniel and to his readers the length of this period was a matter of vital interest, and it is therefore not without reason that the book closes with the most emphatic statements on the subject. The last words of v. 7 are obviously a further specification of what precedes, and cannot refer, as Hävernick imagines, to some period subsequent to the 3½ years. Von Lengerke renders, “And when the scattering of a portion of the holy people should come to an end, all this should be ended”. So also Hitzig, except that he reads עֲדָלִים בְּכָלָה, which is certainly more in accordance with Hebrew syntax. By the “portion of the holy people” the writer, it is supposed, means the Israelites in exile. But even if we admit as possible this use of ת, the difficulty remains that the verse, so construed, is tautological. It is surely unnecessary for the angel to assert in so solemn a manner that all these visions are to be fulfilled “when the Israelites are no longer dispersed”. The final deliverance of Israel, to which all the visions in Daniel lead up, naturally includes the gathering together of the dispersed of the holy people. Some other commentators, e.g. Ewald, render, “when they shall cease to break in pieces (or scatter) the power of the holy people”. But this is no less tautological than the former interpretation, not to mention the strangeness of the metaphor יְמֵנֶיךָ. In view of these difficulties the correctness of the text becomes very doubtful. The LXX. has ὅτι εἰς καιρὸν καὶ καιροὺς καὶ ἡμίσυ καιροῦ ἡ συντέλεια χειρῶν ἀφέσεως λαοῦ ἄγον καὶ συντελεσθήσεται πάντα ταῦτα<sup>1</sup>. Here the words ἡ συντέλεια χειρῶν ἀφέσεως are so totally meaningless that we have every reason to regard them as a literal rendering, i.e. the translator read γενεράς instead of יְמֵנֶיךָ. The substitution of the Plural (χειρῶν) for the Singular (רִאשׁוֹת) is, of course, of no consequence. If therefore we read עֲדָלִים בְּכָלָה יְמֵנֶיךָ, the passage

<sup>1</sup> That the Syro-Hexaplar has ~~ταῦτα~~ does not prove that Paul of Tellā read dphēsēws χειρῶν but merely that he took the words to mean “the hands’ releasing” and was obliged to invert the order, owing to the exigencies of Syriac syntax.

will signify, “And when the power of the Shatterer of the holy people should come to an end, all these things should be ended”. For this use of נִצְחָה cf. Judg. vii. 19. Jer. li. 20 ff. Ps. ii. 9, and for בְּכָלֹת יָד cf. Ps. lxxi. 9, בְּכָלֹת בַּשְׂרֵךְ Prov. v. 11, as well as the common application of כָּלָה to “failing” of the eyes. This reading seems moreover to be supported by chap. vii. 25, “they shall be given into his power (בִּינָה) until a time, and times, and half a time”. By “the Shatterer of the holy people” would be meant Antiochus Epiphanes, and, so understood, the passage is no longer tautological, its object being to assure the readers of the book (who naturally comprehended the allusion) that this great oppressor was to be last oppressor of all—when his power ceased, the sufferings of the holy people would be ended for ever.

8—13. That Daniel is represented as not understanding the angel’s words, shews that those words must contain a special reference to the time of the author, for to suppose that v. 7 was meant to be unintelligible to the readers would be absurd. On Daniel’s inquiry, “What is the end of these things?” he is dismissed by the angel (v. 9), who reminds him that the words are to be “hidden and sealed till the time of the end”<sup>1</sup> (see v. 4), i.e. the revelations are really intended, not for Daniel himself, but for readers in the distant future. In v. 10 the coming time is briefly described—it is to be a time in which “many” (Israelites) are purified (by afflictions), while others will only plunge themselves more deeply in guilt. The words לא יִמְשֻׁרְךָ Von Lengerke explains as “shall not understand the end of these things” (see v. 8). But there appears no reason for this limitation of the sense, and it is more natural to interpret, with Hitzig, “but the wicked are all without understanding”, i.e. they are acting blindly, whereas “the teachers” possess true wisdom. In vv. 11, 12 the limits of “the time of the end” are given. “And from the time when the daily sacrifice is taken away and the abomination of desolation is to be set up, are 1290 days. Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to 1335 days”. בָּרוּךְ הוּא

<sup>1</sup> That people who believe “the time of the end” to be still future should write commentaries on the Book of

Daniel is one of the most singular examples of the irony of history.

probably to be taken as a Perfect; for the syntax cf. טוֹמֵם וְבָאַת הַחֲלִיל II Chr. xx. 22. The ל in לְתַת expresses a purpose (cf. chap. ii. 16). That the 1290 days and the 1335 days date from the same moment, is generally agreed; we have therefore here two events, one of which is to happen 1290 after the desecration of the Temple, and the other 45 days later. Hävernick and Von Lengerke suppose that the 1290 days end with the re-consecration of the Temple, and the 1335 with the death of Antiochus. Hitzig, on the other hand, places the death of Antiochus at the end of the 1290 days. It is impossible here to discuss the chronological difficulties to which these hypotheses lead. I have before endeavoured to shew that the book of Daniel was finished some time before the re-consecration of the Temple, which, according to I Macc. iv. 52, took place exactly three years after its profanation, i.e. near the end of the year 165 B.C. If this be so, the end of the 1290 days, and a fortiori the end of the 1335 days, must have been still future when the author wrote. It is therefore impossible for us to guess what particular events are here contemplated, and why the numbers 1290 and 1335 are chosen—but it would appear from the context that at the end of the 1290 days some great deliverance is to be wrought, and that at the end of the 1335 days the period of complete blessedness is to begin. “And do thou depart to (await) the end, and so thou shalt rest and stand up to (receive) thy portion, at the end of the days”. The last verse of Daniel is one of the most obscure. That זֶה here means “the end of Daniel’s life” (Von Lengerke) is scarcely probable, for in that case we should expect לְקַצֵּן (cf. chap. xi. 45. Ps. xxxix. 5). Still more objectionable is Hitzig’s rendering, “go to the goal”, i.e. go thy way; in Hab. ii. 3, to which Hitzig appeals, זֶה does not refer to the “purpose” or “goal” of a person, but to the “accomplishment” of a prediction. Prof. Robertson Smith supposes that the first זֶה was wrongly introduced by a scribe, whose eye, passing from the preceding תְּ, caught the last letters of לְנַרְלִי in the second half of the verse. The sense would then be, “And do thou depart and take thy rest”, etc. Most commentators, e.g. Von Lengerke and Ewald, explain וְתַעֲמֵד וְתַעֲמִיד as meaning “and so thou shalt rest (in thy grave) and rise (from the dead)”, etc. To this Hitzig objects that in no Semitic dialect does שָׁמֵר mean “to rise from the dead”. But those who find here an allusion to the resurrection can reply that if this belief were new in the days of the author, a fixed technical term may have been wanting. Even in later times, when the resurrection was a familiar idea, several quite distinct words were used for it—the Rabbins usually said טְהִרָת הַנֶּחֶם, the Syrian Christians kēyāmtā or nuh-hāmā, the Mohammedans kiyāma, ba'th, or hashr. However this may be, זֶה can scarcely differ in meaning from אַתְּרוּת הַיּוֹם chap. x. 14; it is contrary to all analogy to explain it, with Hitzig, as “the end” of Daniel's earthly life.

APPENDICES.

APPENDIX I.

THE PALMYRENE DIALECT.

OF all the Aramaic dialects spoken by the heathens of Syria that which has left the most considerable remains is the dialect of Palmyra (in Greek Πάλμυρα, in the Old Testament תְּמִרָּה, II Chr. viii. 4, in the native inscriptions תְּמֹר or תְּמַר<sup>1</sup>, and in Arabic تَمْر). The Palmyrene inscriptions were mostly set up during the first three centuries of the Christian era, and are of various kinds, honorific, funereal, religious, etc. They are written in a character which, like the present Hebrew character, is a modification of the old Aramaic Alphabet<sup>2</sup>. Many Palmyrene inscriptions are accompanied by Greek translations. The largest collection is that made by the Count De Vogué in his great work La Syrie Centrale, Paris, 1868—1877. Most of the Greek texts have been published by Waddington in his Inscriptions grecques et latines de la Syrie, Paris, 1870. From these works the following specimens have been taken, with the exception of No. III. and the Greek text of No. I. I have availed myself also of Nöldeke's "Beiträge zur Kenntniss der aramäischen Dialecte" in the Z. D. M. G. Vol. xxiv., and Mordtmann's "Neue Beiträge zur Kunde Palmyra's" in the Sitzungsberichte der königl. bayer. Akademie der Wissenschaften, Munich, 1875.

<sup>1</sup> According to Josephus, Antiq. viii. 6. 1, the Syrian pronunciation was Tadamar (Ταῦαμωρα).

<sup>2</sup> To express numbers the Palmyrenes use the following signs—Simple strokes for units up to 4—Y for 5—D for 10 —3 for 20. A number followed by D expresses hundreds, e.g. DIII = 300.

Words and letters which are uncertain or which have been supplied conjecturally are enclosed in square brackets.

I.

(De Vogüé, No. 36 b, p. 41)

- (1) דְּכָרְנָא דְּנָה דֵי הוּא יִקְרָבֶת עַלְמָא בְּנָא יְמָלְכוּ בָּר
מְקִימָו דֵי מְתָקְרָא אֲקָלִישׁ בָּר מְלָכָו בָּר בְּלָעָקָב
(2) תְּדָמְרִיא לִקְרָבֶת בְּנָהִי וּבְנִי בְּנָהִי עַד עַלְמָא בִּירָחָ נִיטָן
שְׁנָת //גַּם// 3333

(Greek text, publ. by Mordtmann, "Neue Beiträge zur Kunde Palmyra's", p. 27)

- (1) ΜΝΗΜΕΙΟΝ ΑΙΩΝΙΟΝ ΓΕΡΑΣ ΩΚΟΔΟ
(2) ΜΗΣΕΝ ΙΑΜΑΙΧΟΣ ΜΟΚΕΙΜΟΤ ΤΟΤ ΚΑΙ
(3) [ΑΚ]ΚΑΛΕΙΣ[ΟΤ] ΤΟΤ ΜΑΛΧΟΤ ΤΟΙΣ ΤΕΚ-[ΝΟΙΣ]

(Translation of Palmyrene text)

(1) This memorial, which (is) a sepulchre of honour, was built by Yamliku, son of Mokīmu, who (was) called Aḳkalish, son of Māliku, son of Bēl-‘akab,

(2) the Palmyrene, to the honour of his sons and his sons' sons, for ever. In the month Nīsān (i.e. April), the year 394 (of the Seleucid era, i.e. 83 A.D.).

(Notes)

(1) דְּכָרְנָא (according to the Syriac pronunciation) corresponds to the Bibl. Aram. Ezra vi. 2), דְּכָרְנִיא (id. iv. 15); in Christian Palestinian we find דִּיכְרָנוֹן (pron. Dikron), and in a Haurān inscription

(De Vogüé, No. 2)<sup>1</sup>. יְהִיר בָּת עַלְמָא lit. "the honour of an eternal abode"—in Syriac also سَبَقْ حَلْمَه means "sepulchre" (Apocryphal Acts, ed. Wright, p. 5. 5. 5), cf. קִיְתָה in Eccles. xii. 5. like many other Arabic names in these inscriptions (e.g. מֶלֶכֶת, מֶלֶכֶת etc.), has the Arabic termination u, which in classical Arabic is the sign of the nominative case. The name appears in Greek either as ΜΑΛΧΟΣ or ΜΑΛΙΧΟΣ, and therefore seems to be the common Arabic مَالِكٍ (Gr. ΒΗΛΑΚΑΒΟΣ) apparently means "Bel has granted issue, posterity". The occurrence of the Babylonian deities Bel and Nebo in Palmyrene names shews how wide and how lasting an influence was exercised by Babylonia over Syrian religion.

II.

(De Vogüé, No. 123 a, I—p. 73)

- (1) [ב]ירח אלול שנת // תְּשִׁבְתֵּן
- (2) חֲמֹנָא דְנָה וּלְתָא ד[דְנָה]
- (3) [ע]בְדוּ וּקְרְבוּ לְשִׁמְשׁ וּזְבִיר[א]
- (4) בְּנֵי מֶלֶכֶת בָּר יְרִיעָבֵל בָּר נְשָׂא
- (5) דִי מַחְקָרָא בָּר עַבְרָבֵל דִי מְ[ן]
- (6) פְּחָד בְּנֵי מְגַ[דְתָה] לְשִׁמְשָׁ[א]
- (7) אֱלֹהָה בֵּית אֲבוֹהָן עַל חֵ[יְהִי]
- (8) [ו]חֵ[יְהִי]וֹן וְחֵ[יְהִי] אֲחִיהָ[וֹן]
- (9) וּבְנֵיהָ[וֹן]

(Translation)

(1) In the month Ilūl (i.e. September), the year 396 (i.e. 85 A.D.),

(2) this Sun-pillar and this altar

<sup>1</sup> In the 11th ed. of Gesenius' Handwörterbuch, s.v. דְכְרוֹן, this form is wrongly given as Palmyrene.

- (3) were made and consecrated by Lishmash and Zebidā
- (4) the sons of Māliku son of Yarī'bēl son of Neshā
- (5) who (was) called son of 'Abdibel, who (was) of
- (6) the clan of the Sons of ..... — to the Sun,
- (7) the god of the house of their father, for his welfare
- (8) and their welfare and the welfare of their brethren
- (9) and their sons.

(Notes)

(2) שָׁמַן “Sun-pillar” is used in Biblical Hebrew in the Plural only, unless שָׁמְנָה in Is. i. 31 be a corruption of החטָן, as De Lagarde has suggested. אֲלֹת “altar” is common in Syriac. For the feminine of “this” the Palmyrene dialect uses either דְּנָה or דְּנָה (= נָה in Daniel).

(3) לְשָׁמֵן signifies “(consecrated) to the Sun”, and זְבִידָא “given”, “bestowed (by God)”, cf. the Hebr. I קְבִידָה Kings iv. 5.

(4) The name יְרִיעָבֵל is explained by De Vogué (p. 59) as “quem Bel gratum habebit”, from the verb רָעָה; but this does not satisfactorily account for the form יְרִיעָבֵל. Perhaps יְרִיעָבֵל may mean “Bel causes to thrive”, from the Arabic verb عَلَى Imperf. يَرِعَ “to thrive”.

(6) פְּחָד is the Arabic فَخْدَة lit. “thigh”, hence “clan”, as sprung from a single ancestor. The word presupposes male kinship, just as بَطْن (Hebr. בָּטָן), when used for “tribe”, presupposes female kinship. The name מְגַדָּה is uncertain, since in this inscription הָנָה and הָנָה are not distinguished, as they usually are in Palmyrene, by the diacritical point.

III.

(See De Vogué, “Inscriptions palmyréniennes”, in the Journal Asiatique for 1883, and Sachau “Ueber den palmyrenischen Νόμος τελωνικός” in the Z. D. M. G. xxxvii. pp. 562 ff. Of this long inscription, which is grievously mutilated in parts, only the beginning is here given.)

- (1) הַגָּמָא דֵי בּוֹלָא בִּירָח [נִיסְן] יּוֹם כֶּעָזָב // שָׁנָת כֶּעָזָב // בְּפֶלְהָדְרוֹתָא דֵי בּוֹנָא בָּר
- (2) בּוֹנָא בָּר חִירָן וְגַרְמְטִיא דֵי אַלְגְּסְדָּרָם בָּר אַלְגְּסְדָּרָם בָּר פְּלַפְּטָר נְגַמְּטוֹס דֵי בּוֹלָא וְדָמָס וְאַרְכּוֹנִיא.
- (3) מַלְכָו בָּר עַלְיָי בָּר מַקְיָמוֹ וְבִידָא בָּר נְשָׂא כָּר הָות
בּוֹלָא כְּנְשָׂא מִן נְמוֹסָא אֲשֶׁר
- (4) מְדִי כְּתִיב מִן לְתַחַת בְּדִילְדִי בְּבוֹנִיא קְרָמִיא בְּנְמוֹסָא
דֵי מַכְסָא עֲבִידִין שְׁגַנִּין חִיבָן
- (5) מַכְסָא לֹא אַסְקוֹנו וְהָוו מַתְגַּבְבִּין מִן עַדְא בְּמַדְעָם דֵי
הָוּ מַתְכַּתְבָּן בְּאֲגֻרוֹנִיא דֵי
- (6) מַכְסָא [י]הָוּ נְבָא הַיָּק בְּנְמוֹסָא וּבְעִירָא וּמַטְלָן כוֹת
וּבְנִין שְׁגַנִּין עַל צְבוֹתָא אַלְן
- (7) סְרַבְנִין הָוּ בְּינִי תְּגָרָא לְבִינִי מַכְסִיא אַתְחָוי לְבּוֹלָא
דֵי אַרְכּוֹנִיא אַלְן וּלְעַשְׁרָתָא
- (8) דֵי יְבָקָן מַדְעָם דֵי לֹא מַפְקָן בְּנְמוֹסָא וַיְכַתֵּב בְּשִׁטָּר
אֲגֻרָּנִיא חְדָתָא וַיְכַתֵּב לְמַדְעָם
- (9) מַדְעָמָא מַכְסָה דֵי מִן עַדְא וְמְדִי אִישָּׁר לְאֲגֻרָּא [י]כַּתֵּב
עַמְנוֹסָא קְרָמִיא בְּגַלְלָא
- (10) דֵי לְקַבֵּל הִיכְלָא דֵי רְבָאָסִירָא וְהָוּ מַבְטָל לְאַרְכּוֹנִיא
דֵי הָוּ בְּזָבָן זָבָן וּעַשְׁרָתָא
- (11) [ו]סְפָרְקִיא דֵי לֹא יְהָוָא נְבָא אֲגֻרָּא מִן אָנָש מַדְעָם
יִתְּר

(Greek text)

(1) ΕΤΟΤΣ ἩΜῖν ΜΗΝΟΣ ΞΑΝΔΙΚΟΤ Ἰν ΔΟΓΜΑ
ΒΟΤΛΗΣ

(2) ΕΠΙ ΒΩΝΝΕΟΤΣ ΒΩΝΝΕΟΤΣ ΤΟΤ ΑΙΡΑΝΟΤ
ΠΡΟΕΔΡΟΤ ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΤ ΤΟΤ ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΤ ΤΟΤ

(3) ΦΙΛΟΠΑΤΟΡΟΣ ΓΡΑΜΜΑΤΕΩΣ ΒΟΤΛΗΣ ΚΑΙ
ΔΗΜΟΤ ΜΑΛΙΧΟΤ ΟΛΑΙΟΤΣ ΚΑΙ ΖΕΒΕΙΔΟΤ ΝΕΣΑ
ΑΡΧΟΝΤΩΝ

(4) ΒΟΤΛΗΣ ΝΟΜΙΜΟΤ ΑΓΟΜΕΝΗΣ ΕΨΗΦΙΣΘΗ
ΤΑ ΤΠΟΤΕΤΑΓΜΕΝΑ ΕΠΕΙΔΗ ΕΝ ΤΟΙΣ ΠΑΛΑΙ ΧΡΟΝΟΙΣ

(5) ΕΝ ΤΩ ΤΕΛΩΝΙΚΩ ΝΟΜΩ ΠΛΕΙΣΤΑ ΤΩΝ
ΤΠΟΤΕΔΩΝ ΟΤΚ ΑΝΕΛΗΜΦΘΗ ΕΠΡΑΣΣΕΤΟ ΔΕ
ΕΚ ΣΤΝΗΘΕΙΑΣ ΕΝ

(6) ΓΡΑΦΟΜΕΝΟΤ ΤΗ ΜΙΣΘΩΣΕΙ ΤΟΝ ΤΕΛΩ-ΝΟΤΝΤΑ ΤΗΝ ΠΡΑΞΙΝ ΠΟΙΕΙΣΘΑΙ ΑΚΟΛΟΤΘΩΣ
ΤΩ ΝΟΜΩ ΚΑΙ ΤΗ

(7) ΣΤΝΗΘΕΙΑ ΣΤΝΕΒΑΙΝΕΝ ΔΕ ΠΛΕΙΣΤΑΚΙΣ
ΠΕΡΙ ΤΟΤΤΟΤ ΖΗΤΗΣΕΙΣ ΓΕΙΝΕΣΘΑΙ ΜΕΤΑΞΤ ΤΩΝ ΕΜΠΟΡΩΝ

(8) ΠΡΟΣ ΤΟΤΣ ΤΕΛΩΝΑΣ ΔΕΔΟΧΘΑΙ ΤΟΤΣ
ΕΝΕΣΤΩΤΑΣ ΑΡΧΟΝΤΑΣ ΚΑΙ ΔΕΚΑΠΡΩΤΟΤΣ ΔΙΑ-ΚΡΕΙΝΟΝΤΑΣ

(9) ΤΑ ΜΗ ΑΝΕΙΛΗΜΜΕΝΑ ΤΩ ΝΟΜΩ ΕΝΓΡΑ-ΨΑΙ ΤΗ ΕΝΓΙΣΤΑ ΜΙΣΘΩΣΕΙ ΚΑΙ ΤΠΟΤΑΞΑΙ ΕΚΑ-ΣΤΩ ΕΙΔΕΙ ΤΟ ΕΚ

(10) ΣΤΝΗΘΕΙΑΣ ΤΕΛΟΣ ΚΑΙ ΕΠΕΙΔΑΝ ΚΤΡΩΘΗ
ΤΩ ΜΙΣΘΟΤΜΕΝΩ ΕΝΓΡΑΦΗΝΑΙ ΜΕΤΑ ΤΟΤ ΠΡΩ-ΤΟΤ ΝΟ

(11) ΜΟΤ ΕΝ ΣΤΗΛΗ ΛΙΘΙΝΗ ΤΗ ΟΤΣΗ ΑΝΤΙ-ΚΡΤΣ ΙΕΡΟΤ ΛΕΓΟΜΕΝΟΤ ΡΑΒΑΣΕΙΡΗ ΕΠΙΜΕ-ΛΕΙΣΘΑΙ ΔΕ ΤΟΤΣ ΤΤΓΧΑ

(12) ΝΟΝΤΑΣ ΚΑΤΑ ΚΑΙΡΟΝ ΑΡΧΟΝΤΑΣ ΚΑΙ ΔΕΚΑΠΡΩΤΟΤΣ ΚΑΙ ΣΤΝΔΙΚΟΤΣ [ΤΟΤ] ΜΗΔΕΝ ΠΑΡΑΠΡΑΣΣΕΙΝ ΤΟΝ ΜΙΣΘΟΤΜΕΝΟΝ.

(Translation of Palmyrene text)

(1) Decree of the Council, in the month Nīsān, the 18th day, the year 448 (i.e. 137 A.D.), during the Presidency of Bōnnē son of

(2) Bōnnē son of Ḥairān and (during) the Secretaryship of Alexander son of Alexander son of Philopator, Secretary of the Council and of the People—and the Archons (being)

(3) Māliku son of Olai son of Mokīmu, and Zebidā son of Neshā. When the Council had been assembled according to law, it decreed

(4) what is written below — Whereas in former times in the law of taxation many articles subject to

(5) taxation were not included, and (so) they used to be charged according to custom in (pursuance of) what was written in the contract, (namely) that

(6) the tax-collector should charge according to law and custom, and (whereas) in consequence of this many times upon these subjects

(7) disputes arose between the merchants and the tax-collectors—it seemed good to the Council of these Archons and to the Ten

(8) that they should examine whatever was not included in the law, and (that) it should be written down in the new document of contract, and (that) there should be written down for each

(9) article its tax which (is) according to custom, and (that) after it had been ratified by the contractor, it should be written, together with the former law, on the stele

(10) which (is) opposite the Temple (called) Rabasirē, and (that) care should be taken by the Archons who are (in office) at any time, and (by) the Ten,

(11) and (by) the Syndics, that the contractor do not demand any extra charge from any man.

(Notes)

(1) פָּלְחָרָוֶתָּא is the Greek προεδρία, but with the Aramaic termination.

(3) שָׁרֵךְ lit. "certified", from the root שָׁרַךְ.

(4) מְקַפֵּא, in Bibl. Aram. always (Dan. ii. 28, etc.). מְקִרְבֵּי, "tax", as distinguished from מְקַבֵּשׁ "tax-collector" in lines 6 and 7. With שְׁנֵי compare עֲבָדָתָא Dan. ii. 49. Instead of שְׁנֵי (pron. shenay) we find also שְׁנֵיאָן (pron. shneyan, De Vogüé, No. 15) and even שְׁנֵיאָן (ibid.), with the substitution of ס for ש—which substitution is exceptional in Palmyrene, as in Biblical Hebrew. The syntactical construction חַבֵּן מְקַפֵּא, where the Adj. in the absol. state is made to govern a direct object, occurs often in Syriac; cf. the Hebr. בְּתִים נְלָאִים בְּלֹטָב Deut. vi. 11.

(5) אַסְכּוֹן (Causative of the verb סַלֵּק) may be read either as active אַסְכּוֹן, or as passive אַסְכּוֹנָה. הַוּ or הַוּ is properly masc. plur. but is here used with a fem. subject. עִירָא pron. מְקֻעָם "something", "anything", is common in Jewish Aramaic; in Syriac it becomes meddem. אַגְּנִינִיאָה (μίσθωσις) is an abstract noun from the verb אָגַן.

(6) נְבָא pron. נְבָאָה (Participle). מְפַלְּקָה "because of this" (corresponding to Hebr. עַל־כֵּן) does not seem to occur in the other Aramaic dialects; in Jewish Aramaic כְּנָה means "like", "as". אַגְּנִינִיאָה, in the sense of so many "times" (French, fois), is feminine, as usually in Syriac. צְבוֹתָא (probably אַצְבּוֹתָא) is Plural of צְבוֹתָא (see Dan. vi. 18).

(7) מְגַרְאָה pron. סְרִבְנִין (so Sachau). Is shortened, as in Syriac, from מְלָכִיא; similarly we find מְלָכִיא for "kings" (De Vogüé, No. 28). It is possible that in the spoken language this shortening was much commoner than would appear from the writing.

is stat. emphat. of שְׁבָעָה "ten".

(8) בְּקָא מִסְמָק (according to the analogy of Hebrew and Arabic) or מִסְמָק (according to the Syriac)<sup>1</sup> is the passive participle of the Causative conjugation. Imperfect passive of the Peal. אֲנֹרְיָא is for אֲנֹרְיָא (see line 5).

(9) אַשׁ is here "when" (ἐπειδάν), like Syr. אַשׁ, passive of אָשָׁר (see line 3). אַנְגָּרָא אֲנֹגָּרָא pron. of אָנֹגָּרָא "being", "existing".

(10) הָוּן הָוּן lit. "made to be a care". pron. Pl. of הָוּן "being", "existing".

IV.

(De Vogüé, No. 1, p. 5)

- (1) בּוֹלָא וְרַם עֲבֹדו צְלָמֵיא אַלְן תְּרוּיָהּוּן
- (2) לְאֻילְמֵי בֶּר חִירֵן בֶּר מְקִימֵו בֶּר חִירֵן מְתָא
- (3) וְלְחִירֵן אַבּוּהֵי רְחִימֵי מְדִיתָהּוּן וְדְחָלֵי אֱלֹהֵיָהּ
- (4) בְּרִילְדֵי שְׁפָרוּ לְהָוּן וְלְאֱלֹהִידָהּוּן בְּכָל צְבוּ כְּלָהּ
- (5) לְיִקְרָהּוּן בִּירְחֵ נִיסֵּן שָׁנָת ////כ-33

(Greek text, see Waddington No. 2586)

(1) Η ΒΟΤΛΗ ΚΑΙ Ο ΔΗΜΟΣ ΑΑΙΛΑΜΕΙΝ
ΑΙΡΑΝΟΤ

(2) ΤΟΤ ΜΟΚΙΜΟΤ ΤΟΤ ΑΙΡΑΝΟΤ ΤΟΤ ΜΑΘΘΑ
ΚΑΙ

(3) ΑΙΡΑΝΗΝ ΤΟΝ ΠΑΤΕΡΑ ΑΤΤΟΤ ΕΤΣΕΒΕΙΣ
ΚΑΙ

(4) ΦΙΛΟΠΑΤΡΙΔΑΣ ΚΑΙ ΠΑΝΤΙ ΤΡΟΠΩ ΦΙΛΟ

(5) ΤΕΙΜΩΣ ΑΡΕΣΑΝΤΑΣ ΤΗ ΠΑΤΡΙΔΙ ΚΑΙ

(6) ΤΟΙΣ ΠΑΤΡΙΟΙΣ ΘΕΟΙΣ ΤΕΙΜΗΣ ΧΑΡΙΝ

(7) ΕΤΟΤΣ Ν̄Τ ΜΗΝΟΣ ΞΑΝΔΙΚΟΤ

<sup>1</sup> In Bibl. Aram. the participle of the Hophal does not happen to occur, unless we reckon מִתְּמִין (Dan. ii. 45; vi. 5).

(Transl. of Palm. text)

- (1) The Council and the People have made these statues, both of them,
- (2) to A'ailamī son of Ḥairān son of Mokīmu son of Ḥairān (son of) Mattā,
- (3) and to Ḥairān his father, lovers of their city and fearers of the gods,
- (4) because they were pleasing to them and to their gods in every respect —
- (5) to their honour, in the month Nīsān, the year 450 (i.e. 139 A.D.).

(Notes)

- (1) פְּרִיהַן is a very peculiar form, instead of which we should have expected פְּרִיהָן.
- (2) Before the word מַתָּא the word בֶּר is omitted, as often happens in these inscriptions.
- (3) Pron. מְדִינָתָא, or מְדִינָה; בְּחִימֵי מְדִינָתָא means "city" in Palmyrene as in Syriac, not "province" as in Biblical Aramaic.
- (4) בְּכָל צְבֹו כָּלה lit. "in every thing, the whole of it".

V.

(De Vogüé, No. 123 a, II—p. 74)

- (1) לְבָרִיךְ שָׁמָה לְעַלְמָא טָבָא וּרְחַמְנָא
- (2) מְוֹדָא מְדִין בֶּר וּבְדָבָול בֶּר מְלָכוּ עַל
- (3) חִיּוּי וְחִיא אֲחוּי בִּירָה תְּשָׁרִי
- (4) שָׁנָת עֲזָבָן //

(Translation)

- (1) To Him whose name is blessed for ever, the Good and the Merciful,
- (2) Madyūn gives thanks, the son of Zebad-bōl, son of Māliku, for
- (3) his welfare and the welfare of his brethren. In the month Tishrī (i.e. October),
- (4) the year 533 (i.e. 221 A.D.).

(Notes)

(1) The formula לבריך שמה לעולמא טובא וرحמנא is extremely common in the religious inscriptions of Palmyra. “רְחַמֵּן” “the Merciful”, as a name of God, is found also in Jewish writings, but there is no proof that the Palmyrenes borrowed the term from the Jews, as has often been asserted.

(3) חייא is for חיין.

VI.

(De Vogué, No. 4, p. 8)

- (1) צלמא דנה די יולם אורלים
- (2) זבידא בר מקימו בר זבידא עשתור
- (3) בידא די אקים לה תגרא בני שירתא
- (4) די נחת עמה לאנגשיא ליקרה בדיל
- (5) די שפר להוֹן בירח ניטן שנת עז
- (6) //33//

(Greek text, see Waddington, No. 2599)

- (1) ΙΩΤΑΙΟΝ ΑΤΡΗΛΙΟΝ ΖΕΒΕΙΔΑΝ
- (2) ΜΟΚΙΜΟΤ ΤΟΤ ΖΕΒΕΙΔΟΤ

- (3) ΑΣΘΩΡΟΤ ΒΑΙΔΑ ΟΙ ΣΤΝ ΑΤΤΩ
- (4) ΚΑΤΕΛΘΟΝΤΕΣ ΕΙΣ ΟΛΟΓΕΣΙ
- (5) ΑΔΑ ΕΝΠΟΡΟΙ ΑΝΕΣΤΗΣΑΝ ΑΡΕ
- (6) ΣΑΝΤΑ ΑΤΤΟΙΣ ΤΕΙΜΗΣ ΧΑΡΙΝ
- (7) ΞΑΝΔΙΚΩ ΤΟΤ ἩΝΦ ΕΤΟΤΣ.

(Transl. of Palm. text)

- (1) This statue (is that) of Julius Aurelius
- (2) Zebīdā son of Mokīmu son of Zebīdā (son of) 'Ashtōr
- (3) (son of) Baidā—which was erected to him by the merchants belonging to the caravan,
- (4) who went down with him to Vologesias—to his honour, because
- (5) he was pleasing to them. In the month Nīsān, the year 558 (i.e. 247 A.D.).

(Notes)

- (2) seems to be the masc. form of Gr. Ἀστάρη.
- (3) אַקְמָם is for אַקְמָו ; it would appear that in Palmyrene, as in Syriac, the final ū was often dropt in pronunciation. For שִׁירְתָּא “caravan”, see the Pēshīttā, Gen. xxxvii. 25.
- (4) Vologesias is identified by Mordtmann (“Neue Beitrage”, p. 12) with the city known in Mohammedan times as Al-Kūfa, in Babylonia.

VII.

(De Vogüé, No. 28, p. 28)

- (1) צָלָם סְפֻטְמִיּוֹם אֲדִי[נֶת] מֶלֶךְ מֶלֶכָא
- (2) וּמְהֻקְנֵנוּ דֵי מְדִיתָא כְּלָה סְפֻטְמִיא
- (3) זְבָדָא רַב חִילָא רַבָּא וּבוּי רַב חִילָא
- (4) דֵי תְּרִמוֹר קְרַטְסְטָא אֲקִים לְמַרְדוֹן
- (5) בִּירָח אֲבָדָה דֵי שְׁנַת עֲצָמָה //3333//

(Translation)

- (1) Statue of Septimius Odainat, king of kings,
- (2) and stablisher of the city, all of it; the Septimii,
- (3) Zabdā, chief general, and Zabbai, general
- (4) of Palmyra, most noble persons, have erected (this) to their lord,
- (5) in the month Āb (i.e. August) of the year 582 (i.e. 271 A.D.).

(Notes)

- (1) Odainat (Gr. ΟΔΑΙΝΑΘΟΣ, see De Vogué, No. 21) was king of Palmyra and husband of Zenobia.
- (2) Pron. פְּתַקְנָנָא, from פְּתַקֵּן “to set in order”.
- (4) The Greek word κράτιστοι appears in Palmyrene either as וא קרטסטוא (with the Aramaic plural ending ē), or as אֲוֹ קרטסטוא (where אֲוֹ represents οι, pronounced in later times somewhat like the French u).

VIII.

(De Vogüé, No. 29, p. 29)

- (1) צִלְמָת סְפֻטְמִיא בֶּת זֹבִי נְהִירָתָא וּדְרָקְתָּא[א]
- (2) מְלָכָתָא סְפֻטְמִיאוֹא וּבְדָא רָב חִילָא
- (3) רָבָא זֹבִי רָב חִילָא דִי תְּרוּמָה קְרַטְסְטָוָא
- (4) אֲקִים לְמַרְתָּהָוָן בִּירָח אֲבָדִי שָׁנָת עֲצָמָא//

(Greek text, see Waddington No. 2611)

- (1) ΣΕΠΤΙΜΙΑΝ ΖΗΝΟΒΙΑΝ ΤΗΝ ΛΑΜ
- (2) ΠΡΟΤΑΤΗΝ ΕΤΣΕΒΗ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΣΣΑΝ
- (3) ΣΕΠΤΙΜΙΟΙ ΖΑΒΔΑΣ Ο ΜΕΓΑΣ ΣΤΡΑ
- (4) ΤΗΛΑΤΗΣ ΚΑΙ ΖΑΒΒΑΙΟΣ Ο ΕΝΘΑΔΕ
- (5) ΣΤΡΑΤΗΛΑΤΗΣ ΟΙ ΚΡΑΤΙΣΤΟΙ ΤΗΝ
- (6) ΔΕΣΠΟΙΝΑΝ ΕΤΟΤΣ ΒĀΦ MHNΕΙ ΛΩΩ.

(Transl. of Palm. text)

- (1) Statue of Septimia, daughter of Zabbai, the illustrious and the just (lady),
- (2) the queen; the Septimii, Zabdā, chief general,
- (3) and Zabbai, general of Palmyra, most noble persons,
- (4) have erected (this) to their mistress, etc.

(Notes)

- (1) צלמה, not צלמה, since the statue is that of a woman. At the end of the line an n seems to have been effaced, as Nöldeke has remarked. Instead of זרחתא we should have expected זרחתא (pron. זְרִיחַתָּא); perhaps the i was pronounced short in the closed syllable.

APPENDIX II.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES.

I.

THE EARLIER PTOLEMIES.

	B.C.
Ptolemy Soter . . . . .	306
" Philadelphus . . . . .	283
" Euergetes I. . . . .	247
" Philopator . . . . .	222
" Epiphanes . . . . .	204
" Philometor, sole king . . . . .	181
" Philometor and { reigning conjointly . . . . .	170
" Euergetes II. . . . .	164
" Philometor, sole king . . . . .	164
" Euergetes II. . . . .	146—117

II.

THE EARLIER SELEUCIDAE.

Seleucus . . . . .	306
Antiochus Soter . . . . .	281
" Theos . . . . .	262
Seleucus Callinicus . . . . .	245
" Ceraunus . . . . .	226
Antiochus the Great . . . . .	224
Seleucus Philopator . . . . .	187
Antiochus Epiphanes . . . . .	175—164

III.

THE PRINCIPAL EVENTS IN JEWISH HISTORY FROM THE CAPTIVITY TO THE DEATH OF ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES.

	B.C.
Captivity of Jehoiachin . . . . .	circa 599
Captivity of Zedekiah, and destruction of Jerusalem . . . . .	588
First Return of Exiles, under Cyrus . . . . .	538
Completion of the Second Temple . . . . .	516
Second Return of Exiles with Ezra . . . . .	458
First visit of Nehemiah to Jerusalem . . . . .	445
Second visit of Nehemiah . . . . .	432
Pollution of the Temple by the Persian general Bagoses . . . . .	circa 375
Conquest of Palestine by Alexander the Great . . . . .	332
Seizure of Jerusalem by Ptolemy Soter, governor of Egypt . . . . .	320
Defeat of Antiochus the Great by Ptolemy Philopator at Raphia . . . . .	217
Conquest of Palestine by Antiochus the Great . . . . .	204
Antiochus Epiphanes deposes the Jewish high-priest Onias III., and appoints in his stead his brother Jason . . . . .	circu 174
Deposition of Jason in favour of Menelaus, and murder of Onias III. near Antioch . . . . .	171
Antiochus Epiphanes invades Egypt. Jason reinstates himself at Jerusalem by violence. Antiochus, returning from Egypt, plunders the Jewish Temple and slaughters many of the Jews. Jason is expelled . . . . .	170
Antiochus, again invading Egypt, is forced to retire by Popilius Laenas, the Roman legate. The king, on his homeward march, orders the complete suppression of the Jewish religion. Many inhabitants of Jerusalem are slaughtered or driven into exile, and their place is filled by heathen colonists. The daily sacrifice is abolished. On the 15th of Chisleu (December) a heathen altar is set up in the Temple . . . . .	168
Revolt of the Jews headed by Mattathias, a priest, and his seven sons. Death of Mattathias . . . . .	167—166
Judas, son of Mattathias, defeats the Syrian generals Apollonius, Seron, and Gorgias . . . . .	166

B.C.

Another Syrian general, Lysias, is defeated by Judas at Bēth-ṣūr. The Jewish insurgents take possession of Jerusalem and cleanse the Temple, which is re-dedicated on the 25th of Chislev . . . . .

165

Antiochus, in great lack of money, endeavours to plunder a temple in Elymais, but is repulsed by the natives. He soon after dies at Tabae in Persia . . . . .

164

INDEX

OF THE PRINCIPAL WORDS AND ROOTS COMMENTED UPON.

The numbers refer to the pages. Roots are marked with the sign  $\sqrt{}$ .

אָמֵן	see
אַרְמָתֶשֶׁבֶר, אַדְרוֹנוֹרִיא,	201
אַרְבָּי,	79
אַנְקָל,	75
אַוְקוֹן,	129
אוֹזָר,	166
אוֹרָה, אַזְבָּא, אַזְבָּא אַזְבָּא,	מִזְאָן (K. אֲנָנוֹ), 68
אַחֲרָוֹת,	73
אַחֲרִיתָה,	103
אַחֲרִינוֹ,	103
אַחֲרִי,	75
אַחֲרִין (K. אַחֲרִין), אַחֲרִינוֹ,	90
אַחֲשָׂרְפָּנִיא,	71
אַחֲשָׂרוֹשׁ,	79, 109
אִימְטָנִי,	149
	122
אִיטִי,	74
אַלְוָה,	74, see also Addenda
אַפְּחוֹת,	80
אַקְפָּנִי,	see אִימְטָנִי
אַקְבָּתָה,	91
אַגְּדָע,	70
אַגְּנָזָה (K. אֲגָנָזָה), אַגְּנָזָם (Aramaic),	124
אַגְּנָזָם (K. אֲגָנָזָם),	92
אַגְּנָזִים (Aramaic),	93
אַסְכָּר,	110
אַפְּדוֹן,	200
אַפְּיִים,	186
אַרְגָּנָה,	101
אַרְגָּזָן,	101
אַרְבָּה,	74
אַרְזָחָה, אַרְזָחָה,	110
אַרְיָה	72

אָרְקֶתֶה,	101	בּוֹבּ,	110
אַרְקָה,	95	(גְּנֵה K.) גְּנִיה	122
(אַרְעָה K.) אֲרֻעָה	75	גְּנֵר / גְּנֵרִיאָל,	הַגְּבִיר see 136
אַרְעִית,	113	גְּבָרִיּוֹן,	81
אַשְׁלָמָה,	134	גְּדָרְבִּיאָה,	79
אַשְׁפָּנָה,	63	גְּדָרָף /	120
אַשְׁפָּנָה,	58, 59	גְּנוּחָה / גְּנוּחוֹת /	120
אַשְׁר לְטוֹהָה,	61	גְּנוּחוֹת / גְּנוּחוֹת /	120
אַשְׁתָּדוֹר,	112	גְּנוּרוּן,	73, 74
אַשְׁתָּתוֹם,	93	גְּנוּרָא,	100
(אַשְׁתָּתוֹם K.) אַשְׁתָּנוֹ	83	גְּנוּרִיל, גְּנוּרִיל,	72
אַתְּנוֹ,	81	see also Addenda p. x
אַמְּיִ,	71	גְּנוּפִין,	120
אַתְּפִירִית,	124
אַתְּעַקְרָה (K.) אַתְּעַקְרָוּ,	99
		ד
		דָּאִינִין (K.),	75
		דָּאִינִין (K.) דָּאִרְיָן,	75
בֵּין,	153, 165	דָּחָח / דָּחָח /	112
בִּינְתִּי,	149	דָּבָנוֹ,	112
בִּירָה,	129	דָּינָא,	123, 124
בָּלֶל,	111	דָּבוֹן,	74
בָּלָא /,	126	דָּגָאֵל,	60
בָּלָאֵצֶר,	בָּלָאֵצֶר	דָּקָק,	75
בָּלָאֵצֶר,	61	דָּתָה,	70, 126
בָּלָאֵצֶר,	99	דָּתְבִּירָא,	79
בְּלָקְטִי,	184
בְּנִינְתָּה,	95
בָּעוֹ,	110	ה
בָּשִׁי,	יְבָעָן see	הָאִידְּרִי,	77
בָּרָאֵלְהָוִן,	85	הַגְּבִיר,	159
בָּרִית,	187	הַדְּבָרִיא,	85
בָּתְרִירָא,	בָּתְרִירָא	הַדְּבָם,	69
		הַכְּרָר,	185
		חָנוּשָׁתָא, חָנוּשָׁתָא,	73
נָאֵל /, defile,	61	הַוִּסְרָה,	206, 207
		חִיקָּה,	29

סִיבָּג,	89	חֶרְקָל,	166
סִימָן,	77	חוֹבֵךְ,	61, 62
סִימִית, סִיטִי,	81, 82	חוֹדֵךְ,	104
סִכְרוֹן,	107	חוֹזָה, proper ,	83
סִלְוִיּוֹן,	137	טוֹתָה,	90, 91
(סִמְנִיקָא K.) חַמִּינָכָא,	101	חַטְאָה (K.) חַטִּיר,	94
סוֹן,	29 (note), 95	חִירָה,	103, 104, 139
סִנְקָה,	113	חִלְצָם,	100
סִנְאָל,	73	חִלְקָוֹת,	194
סִחָלה,	101	חִלְקָלָקָוֹת,	32
סִאלָנִי,	73	חִמָּא, חִמָּא,	71
הַצְּדָא,	82	חִמְרוֹת, חִמְרוֹת,	152, 153
הַקְּמָת, הַקְּיָמָת,	121	חִפָּה,	131
הַקְּיָמָת,	121	חִצְף, ✓	72
קְרָנֶשׁ,	110	חִרְטָמִים,	31, 63
סִשְׁבָּחָת,	73	חִרְצָא,	100
הַתְּזִירָת,	73	חִשָּׁב,	96
הַתְּמִבָּרִית,	188
הַתְּקִנָּת, הַתְּקִנָּת,	97	ט
הַתְּרֻמָּמָת,	105	טָאָב,	113
ז		טָוָת,	112
(זִיְשָׁן K.) זָעַן,	75	טָוָם,	99
זָבוֹן, ✓	69, 70	טְפָרָא,	96
זָהָר, ✓	202
זָיו,	74	יָאָר,	32
זָמָנוֹן, זָמָנוֹן,	72	יָבָלָךְ,	103
זָנוֹן,	80	יָבָלָךְ,	93
זָנִיר,	122	יָבָלָא,	see ✓ בָּלָא
זָעֲפִים,	31	יָבָעָן, יָבָעָן,	97
זָרְעוֹת, זָרְעוֹת,	182	יָדָע, ✓	אֲנָכְעָא see
זָרְעָנִים, זָרְעָנִים,	62	יְהִיד,	73
		יְכָל, ✓	73
חַרְשָׁבָה,	83	יְבָל,	86
		יְפָתָח,	מְחִי see

יְגָנֹעַלְךָ, יְגָנֹעֲךָ,	72	לְבִגְשׁ	73
שְׁמֶדֶנָה,	138	לְבּוֹנָה	לְבּוֹנָה
שָׁאָלָה,	152	לְבּוֹנָה /	see לְבּוֹנָה
אַבָּאָבָא,	125	לְרִנָּא	124
וְשֵׁטְטוֹ,	see שְׁטָטָט	לְהָ	96
וְשָׁלָרִים,		לְהָוָה, לְהָוָה,	35
וְשֵׁתְפָוּ,	183	לְהָוָה,	69
וְיִתְ	103	לְהָוָה,	99
וְיִתְבּוֹ,	38	לְחַמָּם, feast,	99
וְיִתְבּוֹ,	126	לְחַמָּתָה,	99
וְיִתְרָה /	see נַעֲמָרָתִי	לְלָבוֹן,	195
וְיִתְשְׁמוֹן,	69	לְלָבוֹן,	126

ב

בָּאָה /	191	מְאַנְגָּא, מְאַנְגָּא,	106, 107
בָּחָל /	73	מְאַנְגָּא,	99
כְּנוֹי,	111	מְגַנְּחוֹ	120
כּוֹל /	73	מְדַעַּ	59
פְּחַרְחָה,	75	מְהִימָּוֹ	77
כְּלָקְבָּל,	see Addenda p. xi	מְהֻקְבִּין,	85
כְּלָאָל,		מְוַיָּד,	138
כְּמוֹ /	154	מְזִיָּה, מְזִיָּה,	83
כְּנוֹ,	199	מְזִוּן,	91
כְּאָא,	32, 176, 197	מְתָהָא, מְתָהָא,	104
כְּסָף,	104, 105	מְתָהָי,	97
כְּפָרוּתִי,	83	מְתִתִּת (K.) מְתִתִּת,	94
פְּרַבְּלָתָהוֹן,	84	מִיְשָׁאָל,	60, 61
כְּרוֹנוֹא,	80	מִיְשָׁד,	61
כְּרוֹו /	107	מִשְׁרָדִים,	174
כְּרָסָא,	104	מִבְּטָמֵעַ,	see כְּמוֹ /
כְּשָׁלְדִים,	31	מִכְּשָׁפֶךָ
כְּשָׁפָ /	68	מְלָאוֹת, מְלָאוֹת,	68
כְּפָתִים,	191	מְלָכִיות,	149
כְּפָטָל,	81, 100	מְלָכָל (with עַם),	30
		מְלָצָר,	113
			62

מוֹ, קוֹ,	81	נוֹתְרִי,	168
מָנָא,	105, 106	נַחֲרֵץָה,	159
מָגָה,	60	גְּכָאָה,	see ✓ כאה
מָנוֹן,	72	נִקְהָה,	77
מָעוֹזִים,	197	גַּסְבִּיכָם,	177
מָעוֹלִי, מָעוֹלִי, מָעוֹלִי,	111	נֶפְלָה (K.),	99
מָשָׁר,	152	נֶפְקָה (K.),	99
מָפְשֵׂר,	103	נֶצְחָה,	76
מָקָצָת,	see קָצָת	נֶצְדָּק,	136
מָרָא,	77, 78	נֶתֶן ✓ (Aramaic),	72
מָרְגָּלָתוֹי,	166
מָרוֹטָם,	see רָוֹטָם
מָרָע,	190	סָגָנִים, סָגָנִין,	78
מָרְשִׁיאָה בָּרוּתָה,	194	סִפְנִיה, סְוִמְפְּנִיה,	41, 80
מָשְׁבִּילִים,	194	סְרָכְלִיהּוֹן,	83, 84, 86
מָשִׁיחִים,	155	סְרִכְבִּין,	109
מָשְׁתָּמִם,	192
מָשְׁעָא,	103
מָשְׁרוֹקִיתָא,	80
מָשְׁתְּפֵשָׁן,	102	עַבְרָדָגָנוֹ,	61
מָשְׁפֵּד,	111, 112	שְׁדֵדוֹן,	126
מָשְׁפְּכוֹן,	101	עַזְמִיחָה,	94, 95
מָתִישָׁם,	69	עַבְטָא,	71
		עִיר, watcher,	91
		עַלְאָ,	109
		עַלְיוֹנִין,	125
בְּבוֹכְרָנָאָר, בְּבוֹכְרָנָאָר,	58	עַלְלוֹן (K.)�לְלוֹן,	90
בְּבוֹזָה,	69, 104	עַלְלָת (K.)�לְלָת,	103
בְּבָשָׁפָא,	100	עַם, used of time,	89
נַנְדָּר ✓,	123	עַמְדָּה ✓,	208
נַנְדִּיר,	155, 156	עַמְדָּי,	137
נַנְגָּה, נַנְגָּה,	124	עַמְמִיאָה,	80
נַנְיִיטִי,	140	עַנוֹּן,	95
נַהֲרָא (K.) נַהֲרָא,	72	עַפְתִּיאָה,	91
נַלְיִ, נַלְיִ,	69	עַזְבָּה ✓,	113

עַקְרָב,	92	קָמְפּרִין,	100, 104
עַשְׂוִית,	109	קִיטָּרִים (קִיטָּרֶס. ק.),	80
עַת,	138, note	קָלְלָן,	166
		קָצֵן,	184
		קָצָת,	58
פ		קָרְנָא, 80, see also Addenda p. xi
פְּנַחְטָא, פְּנַחְתָּא,	79	קָרְנוֹי, קָרְנוֹנִים,	130
פְּנַחְיוֹן (קִיטָּרֶס. קִיטָּרִים),	84	קָרְצִיחָה,	81
פְּלָמּוֹן,	134
פְּסָ,	100
פְּסָנְטָרִין, פְּסָנְטָרִין,	80
פְּסָס /,	100, note 2	רְבִיבִיתָא, רְבוֹגָן,	93
פְּרָסִין, פְּרָסִין,	105, 106	(רְבָבָן) רְבָבָן,	123
פְּרָסְתָּא, פְּרָסְתָּה,	100, note 2	רְנוֹגָן,	81
פְּרָק /,	94	רְנַשׁ /,	see קְרִיגְשָׁ
פְּרִתְּפִים,	59	רְנוֹגָן,	74
פְּתָבָג,	60	רְוָקָם,	97
פְּתָנָם,	82	רְדוֹגָן,	72
		רְכִיבָּשׁ,	180
צ		רְקִמָּי,	83, 123
צָבָא,	132, 133 note, 165
צָבוֹ,	112
צָבִי,	132	שְׁבָבָא,	80
צָד,	see לְצָד	שְׁזָטָר,	121
צָדָא,	see הַצָּדָא	שְׁכָל /,	151
צָדָה,	94	שְׁמָת,	112
צָקָן,	157
צָלָם,	79
צָפִיר,	130	שְׁאַלְפָא,	92
צָפְרִין,	91	שְׁבִיקָא,	84
		שְׁבָשׁ /,	see קְנַחֲתְּבָשָׁין
ק		שְׁגָלָתָה, שְׁגָלָל,	99
קִיטָּרִין (קִיטָּרֶס. קִיטָּרִים),	75	שְׁדָל,	112
קִטְּלָן,	70	שְׁדָר /,	111, 112
קִידְשָׁן,	90, 91	שְׁרָנָךְ,	61

שְׂוִי (ק. שְׂיוִי),	105	ת
שְׁפָטָם,	202, 203	תִּדְרַא,	112
שְׁזִוֵּב,	82	תִּפְכּוֹל (ק. חֻכּוֹל),	104
שְׁלָה (ק. שְׁלָל),	86	פְּטָגֵל,	91
שְׁלָה,	89	אֲקָלְטִי, פְּלָקִי,	101, 102
שְׁלָחוֹת,	31	תִּלְמִיחָה,	84, 85
שְׁלָוָה,	95	פְּסָחָה,	74
שְׁלָמִים,	90	פְּמִיר,	32
שְׁמִיא, God,	94	פְּנִינָה,	74
שְׁמָם,	192	תְּפִרְתִּיא,	69
שְׁנוֹהִי,	100	תְּקֵלָה,	79, 80
שְׁגָשָׁה,	58	תְּקֻנוֹן,	105, 106
שְׁמַחַתָּה,	112	תְּקֻנוֹן, תְּקֻפָּה,	97
שְׁמַחַתָּה, שְׁמַחַתָּה,	81	תְּקֻפָּה, פְּלָקִי,	110
שְׁפָרְפָּרָא,	112, 113	תְּרָאָה,	95
שְׁרָא,	72, 73	פְּרִישָׁה,	62
שְׁרִי,	101		166

